VERIONS OF THE EDDIC SCENES IN SUMERIAN, BABYLONIAN, HITTITE, EGYPTIAN, GRECIAN, INDIAN AND ARTHURIAN RECORDS.

SCENE II.—Coming of Thor, Dar, Dar-Danos, Prometheus, Adam or Ar-Thur to Civilize the World.

Sumorean Version of the Coming of Adam as King Dar (Thor) or Danie (Dan) and his Husbandry

The hymns or psalms of the Sumerians, who were the Early Aryans or Early Goths, as I have shown elsewhere, contain numerous references to the coming of King Dar, or Dur, or Tur, which was the early spelling of "Thor," and it has the Sumerian synonym of Dan or Danie, i.e., Thor’s Dan title in the Edda. Two of these hymns sing:

"Dar, the king, the son of Lord Zax (Zeus) . . .
He assembles his people in strength to invade the hostile country.
Dar, the king, the son of his father, has made them turn the face against distant lands. . . .
The god who binds the hosts of the firmament speaks to the lord, to Dar:
'O lord! a station on high (is thy habitation). . . .
O Dar! thy command changes not! . . .'
O lord . . . the smiter of the mountain,
The Darru hero, before whom the foe exists not.
Dar, exalter of men, who makes joyful his side!"

221
THE BRITISH EDDA

"O Lord Sakh (Sig) councillor . . .
The strength begifted, lord of the harvest lands,
He was created on the mountains, lord of the grain fields. . . .
Husbandman who tends the fields art thou, O Lord Sakh."44b

The reference here to his being "the son of his father," presumably defines Adam-Thor's institution of Fatherhood or the patriarchal stage with marriage which he established, as we shall see, in place of the pre-Adamite Edenite Matriarchy, which possessed no marriage, nor home-life, nor succession in the paternal line. And this ancient title for Adam, Dar, or Thor of "Husbandman" is obviously the source of the later Semitic legend that "Adam delved" and "dressed the Garden."

Egyptian Version of the Coming of Adam and his Husbandry

The Ancient Egyptians, who derived their civilization, writing and the roots of most of their language from a colony of Early Aryans or "Sumerians," as I have shown elsewhere, sung of Adam as Atmu or Atum, and by other titles in their hymns long after he had become deified (see his representation in Fig. 28). They identified him with the sun, which he worshipped, and made his chief shrine at Heliopolis or "The City of the Sun," and also called him Heru, a name which equates with his Eddic title of Her or Heria; and they seem also to have called him Daru and Dari.45c They often called him "Creator of men," presumably because he was the first who "made men of men." They refer also to him as "maker of corn" and "maker of herbs of the field," presumably from his being the establisher of agriculture and "a tiller of the ground." One of these Egyptian hymns sings:

222
DIFFERENT VERSIONS OF COMING OF THOR

"Thou who art chief in thy fields . . . the creator of men and women . . . the producer of the staff of life (wheat and barley) and the maker of the herb of the fields which giveth life unto cattle . . . Thou who comest from the land of the Mātchau people. Thou who art Aīmu. . . . Thy names are manifold. Thou overthowest thy enemies. Thou art the Great Hawk which gladdenest the body, the beautiful face which gladdenest the breast." 45a

Greek Version of Adam or Dar-Dan's Advent to Troy as Dar-Danos

Homer, in citing the lineage of Æneas from the first king of the Trojans, says briefly:

"First, Zeus the cloud-gatherer begot Dar-Danos, and he established Dar-Dania; for not yet was holy Ilios (Old Troy) built upon the plain to be a city of mortal men; but still they dwelt on the slopes of many-fountained Ida." 45c

On the Dan title for King Thor or Dar in the Eddas, see Scene V and later, and on Dan as a Sumerian title of Thor, and on Troy and Dardania in Sumerian, see Appendix V and my Dictionary.45f

Indian Version of Adam-Thor or Bur's Advent

The first king, and Aryan king, of the Old World, and the inventor of agriculture was, according to both the Vedas and the ancient Indian Epics, styled Prithu Vainya, presumably a variant spelling of Thor's Eddic titles of Bur-Óth(-Óð) and Ving. These epics record that:

"At his birth all living creatures rejoiced. He was resplendent in person as if the blazing deity of Fire had become manifest. In his right hand was the disc emblem of the Sun-God [the Wood-(Cross) of Thor in the Edda] the sign of a universal emperor. The mighty Prithu Vainya being invested with universal dominion soon removed the grievances of the people—oppressed by the Earth Mother—and winning their affections derived the title of Raja [Regi of Edda] or king. Before his time there were no definite villages or towns, no pastures, no agriculture—the wild fruits and roots forming the only food of the people and procured with great difficulty (often) perished during the period of anarchy—and no highways for merchants. All these civilizations originated in the reign of Prithu.” 459

In the Vedas, under the name of Indra, i.e., the Sumerian In-Dara or "King Dara" (Thor or Eindri) as the father-"god," is the leader of the Aryan tribes to victory, and is given similar personal human traits to those of Thor or Dar in the Edda. He is often spoken of as having been born. In personal appearance he is huge, tawny-haired, tawny-bearded, "fair-lipped," and his complexion has the ruddy brightness of the sun. He has strong, well-shaped arms and carries (like Thor) a "four-cornered" bolt in his hand, which is compared to the Sun.

Gothic Race of King Adam, Dar, Thor, or Arthur

The Gothic race of King Adam, Dar, Thor or Bur, apart from the Eddic accounts and his detailed genealogy therein, is established from Sumerian sources in WMC. It is also seen by his Gothic garb and horned head-dress and Aryan features in all his representations on the countless Sumerian, Hittite, Phoenician, and Babylonian seals, many of which are figured here,45h and in the Hittite rock-sculptures (e.g., Fig. 16), and in the more or less contemporary ivory dagger-handle in Pl. V and Fig. 36, p. 48.
Scene III.—Thor, Adar Bur-Mioth or Pro-Metheus or Adam’s Uplifting of Man in Sumerian and Greek Versions.

Sumerian Version of Adam-Thor or Dar’s Civilizing Uplifting of Man

In the Sumerian hymns, under his title of “Lord Adar” (i.e., his identical title in the foregoing and later Edda) and as Dar or Darru (i.e., Thor), Adam is hailed as “The Exalter of Men,” “The Destroyer of the Evil one,” a Law-giver and Judge, and as of the Sun-cult. Thus in these hymns he is acclaimed:

“The Darru hero before whom the foe exists not,
Adar, exalter of men, who makes joyful his side! . . .
Thou who destroyest the life of the evil one, may thy heart be exalted!
May the command of the Sun-god be a command unto thee!
Like a judge direct the world aright.”

Greek Version of Adam Bur-Mioth’s Civilization of the Aborigines of Asia Minor as “Pro-Metheus”

The memory of Adam Bur-Mioth as “The Friend of Man” and the first great uplifters and civilizers of the early men of the Old World survived amongst the Greeks as the titanic king “Pro-Metheus” (dialectic for the Eddic Bur-Mioth), who first civilized mankind and brought fire to their home hearths and whose location was also significantly in Scythia, Caucasia and Asia Minor. But the poets adopted the late Semitic perversion that he warred against the unjust “god of heaven” instead of against Satan and Hell. The poet Æschylus, about 500 B.C., thus makes Pro-Metheus recite his achievements for the welfare of humanity, which will be seen to be essentially similar to those recorded in the Edda, and the ignorance of the primeval men is also couched in the negative form:

"Of human kind,
My great offence in aiding them, in teaching
The infantile fancy and rousing torpid mind
To take grasp of itself—of this I'll talk;
Meaning to mortal men no blame, but only
The true recital of mine own deserts.
For, soothly, having eyes to see they saw not,
And hearing heard not; but like dreamy phantoms,
A random life they led from year to year,
All blindly floundering on. No Craft they knew
With woven brick or jointed beam to pile
The sunward porch; but in the dark earth burrowed.
And housed, like tiny ants in sunless Caves.
No signs they knew to mark the wintry Year:
The flower-strewed Spring, and the fruit-laden Summer,
Uncalendared, unregistered, returned—
Till I the difficult art of the Stars revealed,
Their risings and their settings. Numbers, too,
I taught them and Writing—how
By marshalled Signs to fix their shifting thoughts,
That Memory, mother of Muses might achieve
Her wondrous works. I first slaved to the yoke
Both ox and ass. I, the rein-loving steeds
Joined to the Car; and bade them ease the toils
Of labouring men vicarious. I the first
Upon the canvas-winged car of Mariner
Was launched wave wandering. Such wise arts I found
To soothe the ills of man's ephemeral life.

Nor healing Food nor Drink,
Nor Unguent knew they, but did slowly wither
And waste away for lack of pharmacy,
Till taught by me to mix the soothing drug,
And check corruption's march.

Yet more: I probed the Earth,
To yield its hidden wealth to help man's weakness—
Iron, Copper, Silver, Gold. . .
And thus with one short word to sum the tale,
Pro-Metheus taught all arts to mortal men." 51
DIFFERENT VERSIONS OF BATTLE OF PHRYGIA

SCENE VI.—Battle of Phrygia in Sumerian and Homeric Greek Versions.

Sumerian Version of the Battle of Phrygia

The Ancient Sumerians, or Early Goths, also preserved the memory of this epoch-making victory of King Thor Dar or Adar over the Lion-tribe of Phrygia or Firig in their hymns. Thus we find they sang:

The sting of Firig, the mighty serpent of Ilu (El or Ale)
Thou O Dar removest, making it to turn away from the land.
Dar, the king, the son of the enthroned Zax has caused it to turn into itself.
He assembles his people in strength to invade the hostile land.
Dar the warrior, who knows not fear (has driven away) the pest.
Dar, the strong hero before whom the foe exists not.
Has driven his chariot over the mountain, has scattered wide the seeds.
Men have altogether proclaimed his name daily, for sovereignty over them.

Homer’s Version of the Battle of Phrygia

Homer also celebrates this great traditional victory of Thor or Ottar in Phrygia in his account of the battle of King Otreus in Phrygia with the Amazons, although with poetic licence he makes Otreus a different individual from Dar-Danos of Troy, though an ally of the Trojans, with further anachronism of placing his date only about a generation before the Fall of Troy. He makes King Priam of Troy say:

``Erewhile fared I to Phrygia, the land of the vines,
And there saw I men of Phrygia, they of the nimble steed, many Even the hosts of Otreus and god-like Myg-don
That were encamped along the banks of Sangarios.
THE BRITISH EDDA

For, I too being their ally was numbered among them,
On that day the Amazons came, the peers of men."

This pioneer civilizing conquest of Phrygia by King Meide-the-Asa, or Geiri, Geer or George, now explains why nearly all the older historical Kings of Phrygia adopted the regnal title of Midas or Gordios.

Phrygia in the Indian Vedas and Epics

Phrygia is called Vriji and Vrichi in the Indian Vedas and Epics. And the Phrygians are referred to as enemies of the Aryans in the Vedas.

SCENE IX.—Eve or Gunn’s (Guen-Evere’s) Marriage with King Adam or Thor in Sumerian, Indian and Greek tradition, and as compared with Genesis.

Sumerian Version of the Marriage of King Adam & Eve

The Sumerian and Babylonian hymns refer to Adam or An-Dara’s marriage with Eve or Idun, and her consecration by him from the Edenite into his higher religion. Thus:

For ever is the Lady of the Eternal Tree thy comrade. . . .
O Lady of Plants, mighty plant of Heaven!
With his pure hands, he has established thee.
In-Duru, the divine antelope has carried thee to a place of purity
With his lustrous hands has he carried thee,
With honey and butter has he carried thee,
He has laid the waters of prophecy on thy mouth,
He has opened thy mouth in prophecy,
Like the Lord, like the heart of the Lord, O evil tongue.¹⁰⁰

228
DIFFERENT VERSIONS OF MARRIAGE OF ADAM

Genesis Version of Adam & Eve's Marriage

In the Hebrew Genesis we read:

"And Adam said, 'This is now bone of my bone and flesh of my flesh. She shall be called Ash because she was taken out of Aish. Therefore shall Aish leave his father and mother and shall cleave unto his Ash, and they shall be of one flesh.' . . . And Adam called his wife's name Ivi." (Gen. ii. 23-24 and iii. 20.)

Here it is seen, on comparing the Hebrew text with our English Authorized and Revised Versions, that the later Hebrews and our English translators of this Hebrew text have made the personal names or titles of Adam (Ad-am and Aish—the latter from the Aryan Sumerian Aš, title of Lord Dar, and his Eddic title Asa or "Lord") and of Eve or Ash (from the Sumerian title of Aš or Ash or Azu for Dar's wife), into generic terms for "man" and "woman," by equating them to the Semitic Chaldee Ishu and Ishshu respectively; and thus effectually disguising the old personal titles in the Hebrew text tradition. And Ivi, which is Adam's wife's name in the Edda as well as in the Hebrew text, is rendered as "Eve" in our English verses.

Marriage, and that monogamous, with Home Life and Paternity, appears to have been first instituted officially by King Adam Thor as an essential part of his Higher Civilization. In the pre-Adamite period under the Matriarchs of Eden promiscuity appears to have exclusively prevailed. Adam, moreover, made marriage a contract; and he himself is styled "The Hallower of Marriage" and "Ottar of the Homesteads." But as we have seen, his own marriage with Eve was by no means the first marriage amongst the Aryans or Goths.
THE BRITISH EDDA

Indian Version of Adam Bur’s & Eve’s Courtship & Marriage

This epoch-making marriage is also celebrated in the ancient sacred books of the eastern branch of the Aryans, the Indian Vedas and Epics. It is thus summarized in its early Vedic commentary, wherein Thor or Bur is called by the Sanskrit form of the latter title, Purū-of-the-Sun,” and Eve or Asi or Asyn-of-Ior is called Āśī of Ur (Uru-āśī):

“Now in the days of yore, the nymph Uru-Āśī dwelt with the royal seer Purū-ranas; and having made a contract with him, she lived in wedlock with him.”

This marriage “contract” appears to have been a civil contract.

The wooing in the Indian Versions is made to be done chiefly by Bur or Thor with lovers’ quarrels. Thus in a long old Vedic hymn, in the dramatic form of a dialogue between “Purū of the Sun (-cult)” and Āśī of Ur, which is full of archaisms and difficult to translate, the opening and other stanzas read as follows—the reference to devouring wolves seem significant of Eden.

\begin{align*}
\text{Purū} & \quad \text{Ho thee, my consort! Stay thou fierce-souled lady, and let us reason for a while together.} \\
\text{speaks.} & \quad \text{Such thoughts as these of ours, while yet unspoken in days gone by have never brought us comfort.} \\
\text{Asī.} & \quad \text{What am I now to do with this thy saying? I have gone from thee like the first of the Dawns.} \\
& \quad \text{Purū of the Sun return to thy home: I, like the wind, am difficult to capture. . . .} \\
& \quad \text{Go home again, thou fool; thou hast not won me!} \\
\text{P.} & \quad \text{Thy lover shall flee forth this day for ever, to seek, without return the furthest distance.} \\
& \quad \text{Then let his bed be in Destruction’s bosom, and there let fierce rapacious wolves devour him} \end{align*}
GREEK VERSION OF MARRIAGE OF ADAM

A. Nay, do not die, Purû, of the Sun, nor vanish: let not the evil-omened wolves devour thee!
With women there can be no lasting friendship: Hearts of hyenas are the hearts of women! 103

As in the Edda and in the Greek legend of her as Aphrodite or "Sea Froth," Eve as "Asi of Ur" is described in the Indian Epics as "sporting in the waters like a swan," a swan-maiden, and in company with Gandharvas 104—the Gandrweirds of the Edda.

Greek Version of Adam Bur-Mioth's or "Pro-Metheus" Marriage with Eve, Asi, or Asia

The memory of Adam Bur-Mioth's marriage with Eve or Asi or Asyn of Ior is found amongst the Greeks in their tradition of Pro-Metheus, i.e., the Bur-Mioth of the Eddas as we have seen. His wife was called therein variously Asia, Hesione and Euruph-Essa, now seen to be merely varying phonetic spellings of the Eddic Asi or Asyn of Ior or Urd, the Queen As of Urdu of the Sumerian and the Urv-Asi of the Indian versions.

In his graceful Greek poem Æschylus in describing Pro-Metheus as lying wounded and bound by his enemies, introduces his wife's brother Oceanos as a visitor who recalls the festive wedding of Pro-Metheus with his sister Hesione, in these words:

"What diverse strain I sang thee then,
Around the bridal chamber,
And around the bridal bath,
When thou my sister fair, Hesione,
Won by rich gifts didst lead
From Ocean's caves thy spousal bed to share!"

Here it is noteworthy that Hesione or Asyn or Eve is again called an "Oceanid" or of "The Sea-froth kin."
THE BRITISH EDDA

Scene X.—Cain's Birth and Boyhood in Sumerian, Egyptian, Indian, and Greek tradition

Sumerian Version of "Cain," son of Adam or Dar, as the great Sumerian Emperor Gan or Kan

The name "Cain" of the English version of the Hebrew Old Testament, spelt in the Hebrew Qain, is now found to be a corruption of the Sumerian name of Adam or Dar's son, the great Sumerian emperor Gan or Kan, who was the famous establisher of the Agricultural Stage of the world, and who bore the regnal name of Bakuš, his Bauge title in the Edda, the historical human origin of Bacchus, afterwards deified by grateful humanity as "The Lord of Plants and Wine" —a fact which is even reflected in the Hebrew Genesis which says "Qain was a tiller of the ground." He is also frequently referred to as "The Son Duke" (Mar-Duk) and the emperor Azag.

Cain in Egyptian Tradition

Similarly the Ancient Egyptians, whom I have shown were a colony of Sumerians in race, speech, hieroglyph writing and culture, also called him Khan(m), "Lord of Corn and Wine," with the synonym of Basa, i.e., Bacchus. And I have established his identity with Khonsu, a title of Horus or Heru, the son of Osiris (Asaru of the Sumerian), the first Aryan King.

Cain in Indian Tradition

Similarly the Indian or eastern branch of the Aryans called him "Lord Gan" (Gan-esha) as "Lord of Grain and Wealth,' and also Basu, i.e., Bacchus. And his birth is described in the Indian Purana epics (WVP. iv. 8 f.)
PRINCE CAIN IN DIFFERENT VERSIONS

Cain in Homer

He is, moreover, disclosed as the historical original of Dar-Danos' (Thor-Dan's) son "Erichthonios," or "Great one of the Earth"—a fitting title for him as the extender of Agriculture and the human original of Bacchus or Dionysos. His capital was Unug or Enoch, i.e., Cain's city of Enoch or Erech, of the Genesis account in Lower Babylonia; and Greek tradition credits Dionysos with building a bridge across the Euphrates.

Homer records his birth and his famous horse-stud (significant in regard to Cain's Eddic title of "The Rider"):

Then Dar-Danos begat a son King Erichthonios
Who became the richest of mortal men.
Three thousand mares had he pastured
Along the marsh meadows rejoicing in their tender foals.

And Cain as Lo-the-Rider is frequently celebrated in the Edda as we have seen. Cain, also, in series with his Eddic title of "The Dispenser of Mead," and his Sumerian title of Bakuš or "Bacchus," is celebrated by Homer as "Gany-Mede" or "Gany (Cain) of the Mead," and "Cup-bearer of Zeus," though made by Homer anachronistically to be a later descendant of Dar-Danos. And in the Edda we have seen that Cain is "the cup-bearer" to King Dar-Dan and his lords.

Cain in the Arthur & Irish Legends as Gawain & Conn

The identity of Gunn, Kon or "Cain" with King Arthur's son, Sir Gawain, is fully established in the next scenes. In the late Arthurian legend Gawain has been generally conjectured by the later bards to have been the "nephew" of King Arthur, but he is now clearly seen to be his son. The young hero Kon or Cain, "the equal of nine men" in the above Edda, and "the equal of nine hundred men" in a later Edda is now disclosed as the historical original of the Irish Sun-hero "Conn, The Fighter of a Hundred."

Scene XII.—Adam's Decalogue in Sumerian, Babylonian, Indian, and Hebrew Versions

Adam's Decalogue re Sumerian, Hittite, Babylonian, Hebrew & Modern Codes

This old Adamite traditional Aryan-Gothic code, with its lofty ethical rules of conduct and principles of equity, seem to be an expansion of Adam's first and greatest commandment "Brothers must not battle" (Sc. II). The provision of arms for self-defence outside Goth­land was mentioned in the tenth merely as a necessary practical precaution against the truculence of the savage tribes of the old pre-Adamite world.

The Sumerian hymns credit Dar or Sig with being a law-giver.

"O Dar! Thy command changes not. . . .
May the command of the Sun-god be a command unto thee!
Like a judge direct the world aright.
O Lord Sakh, councillor!" 124

This Adamite code as preserved in the Edda also gains Sumerian confirmation by the titles and functions of King Dar, Bur, Mid and Mitra (the Eddic Miot and Meti) by their Sumerian definitions as "Holder of the Styles of the Law," "Lord Judge of the Land" and

234
ADAM'S COMMANDMENTS

"Compassionate Counsellor." 125 This last title occurring also in the Sumerian hymns is significantly in literal agreement with the Eddic term of "Counsel" for his commandments.

This Adamite decalogue is obviously the basis of the later decalogues of the imperial Catti or Hittites of Asia Minor, which are now admitted to be the source of the Babylonian code of the Sun-worshipping King Khamurabi—who claimed to have received it graven on tables of stone from the hand of the Sun-god—and later codes down to the Roman and the British and through the Babylonian of the ethical portions of the "Mosaic" decalogues which are now generally regarded as having been borrowed from the old Babylonian in the captivity period, along with the legend attaching to them of having been granted by the hand of God.

The number ten was presumably fixed on by Adam for the convenience of telling off the commands orally on the fingers of the hands in teaching them to his people, and to enable them to memorize them more readily.

This Tenfold or decalogue category runs through most of the Ancient Aryan ethico-religious systems. Thus in Buddhism are the 10 Principles of Right Conduct, the 10 Perfections, 10 Stages of Buddhahood, 10 Fetters or Errors to be corrected. In Brahmanism are 10 Virtues of Initiation, 10 Sins, 10 Mental Restraints, 10 forms of the Sun-god Vishnu, 10 Horses of the Sun, 10 Fire-worshippers, 10 Priests, etc. Pythagoras, a native of Asia Minor, taught the 10 Virtues of Initiation, and made the number 10 representative of Sun and of Heaven. And it seems re-echoed in "the 10 righteous men" sought for in vain by Abraham, and in the "Ten talents" of the worthy servants referred to by Christ.

THE BRITISH EDDA

Indian references to Adam's Laws or Commandments

Under his title of Prithu the Indian Epics record that this first king "is a speaker of truth, bounteous, a keeper of his promise. He is wise, benevolent, patient, valiant, compassionate, kind-spoken and a terror to the wicked. He cherishes the good and in administering justice is indifferent to friend or foe." 126

Hebrew Confirmation (?) of Adam's Decalogue

What appears to be Hebrew confirmation for this Edda, in regard to Eve being traditionally associated with the propagation of these Ten Commandments of Adam, which were diametrically opposed to and directed against the Serpent-cult of Eden, seems to be found in The Ten Curses to be pronounced against Eve, as prescribed in the Talmud.127 These would now seem to be a counterblast against Adam's Ten Commandments in propagating which Eve took an active part, as recorded in this Edda. And the Hebrew story of Eve eating the apple as "The Forbidden Fruit" of the "Tree of Knowledge," and giving it also to Adam to eat, is now seen to be a perversion of the fact that Eve became a votary of King Adam's rival and superior cult of Righteousness, with its sacred emblem of the Rowan Apple and its tree growing in his own garden in Cappadocia and not in Eden. Perhaps the archaic Hittite rock sculpture of the marriage of King Adam and Eve at his capital in Cappadocia, representing Eve as if offering a large apple to Adam (see Fig. 58), seen and misinterpreted by an early Hebrew merchant unable to read the Hittite hieroglyphs, may have been the basis of the Genesis legend of "the temptation of Adam by Eve."
GREEK VERSION OF PROMETHEUS LEGEND

Scene XV.—Wounding of Adam-Thor by Abel-Sut in the Greek Prometheus, Indian, Egyptian, Osiris-Set Versions, and in Lion and Unicorn legend.

Greco-Semitic Perverted Version in "Pro-Metheus Bound" Legend

Whilst the earlier Greeks retained the true tradition of this event in their Zeus-Typho legend as above figured and described, the later Greek myth-mongering bards adopted the spiteful Semitic string of perversions that Adam as Pro-Metheus, although admittedly a noble and righteous hero, and "the best Friend and Champion of Mankind," was fighting against Zeus of Heaven (i.e., himself), who in revenge against Pro-Metheus' "sin" of "stealing Fire from Heaven" to benefit mortal men and of refusing "to cease befriending man," nailed down that hero to a rock in Scythia and kept him there enchained in perpetual torture for evermore! Here, the malicious Semitic wish to harm Adam's memory was clearly "father to the thought." But even these later Greek bards are forced to admit, besides the appalling injustice of such a story, that this so-called "Zeus" was not the grand universal and eternally just father-god of that name of Homer, but was on the contrary "a new" god, and "vindictive, unjust, unrighteous, lustful, cruel and jealous," that he was in fact merely the old malignant Semitic El-Wodan-Satan to whom the Semites had coolly transferred Adam's title of "Zeus" and whom they had pitchforked from Hell into Heaven, and there used as a bogey to revenge themselves on Adam's memory.

Even the manner of wounding is perverted: Adam Pro-Metheus is chained and nailed by iron stakes to a rock, instead of being temporarily felled by a piece of sharp rock, an iron-ore tang. Significantly also the agent of this Semitic "Zeus" who wounds and nails Pro-Metheus is Vulcan of the Hell-fires, with Cyclops ogres as his servants and his sacred animal the Dog, i.e., the domesticated Wolf, and he was the maker of Pandora's box, out of which issued all the ills which beset mankind, and thus he was merely a thinly-disguised reflex of Sutt or Satan. Moreover, this late Greek tale of his agonizing fettering of Adam in everlasting torture, so that "no saviour will appear" is the identical phrase used in the Indian version of the same Mother-Son cult, see below. The poet Æschylus makes Vulcan with a pretence of pity say:

"My heart shrinks back
From the hard task to nail a kindred god
To this storm-battered crag.... High-counselfed son
Of Right-decrining Themis, I force myself
No less than thee, when to this friendless rock
With iron bonds I chain thee, where nor shape
Nor voice of wandering mortal shall relieve Thy lonely watch; but the fierce-burning Sun
Shall parch and bleach thy fresh complexion. Thou
When motely-mantled Night hath hid the day,
Shalt greet the darkness, with how short a joy!
For the morn's sun the nightly dew shall scatter
And thou be pierced again with the same pricks
Of endless woe—and saviour shall be none."

Indian Version as "The Wounding of Mitta of Vind"

This hitherto unrecognized Indian version of the "Pro-Metheus Bound" legend is recited by Buddha in his sermons; and significantly Adam or Pro-Metheus bears therein his Eddic title of "Miot or Mioth of Vind" (in Phrygia) as "Mitta of Vind," and his assailant is called Satta, equating with Sutt of the Edda. Buddha, the Indian pessimistic ascetic teacher of the fifth century B.C. was a namesake of Bodo, Bauta or Wodan, and appears to have been somewhat matriarchist in his sympathies, though excluding women from his order. He was specially contemptuous of Sakka or Indra, i.e., Adam as the deified Zagg, Sig or In-Dara; and in the tales which he used to illustrate his sermons and his imaginary "former births" he claimed to have been "the son of Maya or the Earth Mother who dwelt in a byre with cattle," i.e., the matriarch Meyia or May of the Edda, and "the illegitimate son of a widow," such as Sutt or Baldr is called; he also disapproved of marriage and home-life, and deserted his wife, and claimed to have had several "former births" as a serpent.

In his tale of "Mitta of Vind," Buddha relates that Mitta of Vinda was an unbeliever in the religion of his mother and refused to keep her "full Moon holy day" (presumably lunar cult) and left her; but in consequence of these sins he eventually, after dwelling in palaces, reached hell. There a Satta threw a fiery revolving "Razor Wheel" at him, which stuck in his skull causing him grinding torture. Buddha, who visited the hell, cordially agreed with the "punishment" in a speech, in which he calls himself "King of the Devas (i.e., Devils)," saying:

"The Wheel shall roll and on shall roll; no Saviour shall appear:
Figt on thy head till thou be dead, O Mitta of Vinda hear!
No more to dwell in island palaces
Of Crystal, silver or of sparkling gems—
With flinty headgear thou'rt invested now,
Nor shall its grinding torture ever cease
Till all thy sin be purged and life shall end." 143

Wodanist Perversion of the Event

The Wodanists, headed by the Icelander Snorri, seized with avidity on the wounding of Thor, the arch-enemy of Wodan, and disregarding the texts, retailed a fable making the stone missile stick irremovably in Thor’s skull, causing him everlasting agony. This is in series with the late Pro-Metheus and the above Indian versions.

“Celtic” Perversion of the Event in British Royal Arms

A curious survival of the “Prometheus Bound” version is seen in the Lion and Unicorn emblem of the United Kingdom of Great Britain, in which the unicorn introduced by King James I from Scotland is represented chained and manacled. The unicorn, as I have shown elsewhere, is the royal Goat or Goat-Antelope emblem of the great King Adam Thor as seen in the ancient Hittite sculptures at his capital (see Fig. 58), and on Sumerian, Hittite, Babylonian and Phœnician sacred seals (Figs., p. 63 f.), and repeatedly referred to in the Sumerian and Indian Vedic hymns as well as the Edda. In its later Scots and English representations the heraldists have ignorantly transformed it into a one-horned horse, and, presumably under Keltic, i.e., Chaldee priestly influence (probably Druid) have chained it by the neck, in its relation to its adversary and mauler the Chaldee Lion—the symbol of the ravening Son of Mother May. The Welsh or Cymric Britons, however, with purer traditions, have rightly retained it in its original unfettered form of the invincible Gothic Goat as their national mascot.
DIFFERENT VERSIONS OF PROMETHEUS

Egyptian Version

In the Egyptian version, as altered by the polytheistic priests, who like the Chaldees had erected the Semitic Wolf-fiend chieftain Sutt or Set into a "god," the event is made to be the murder and mutilation of the Solar Father-king Asar (the Osiris of the Greeks), whose name is derived from one of the Sumerian titles of Thor.\(^{144}\) The arch-enemy of Asar or Thor in Egyptian is his "brother" the Wolf-headed fiend called Set or Suti, a name spelt by Plutarch Seth, in series with the Hebrew, and identified by him with the storm-fiend Typho, evidently cognate with the Eddic title of Ty for Baldr as the Wolf-chief. This Wolf-fiend Suti, Set, Seth or Typho is made to kill Osiris (by drowning) and afterwards cut up his body into fourteen pieces. He is represented (see Fig. 12), with a Wolf's head and carrying a tanged or saw-like weapon.

Irish Version of Abel as "Fál of the Fiery Stone Wheel"

"Fial" as one of the dialectic forms in this Edda of the name of Bal or Baldr as the possessor of this "Hell-ball" identifies him with "Fál of the Fiery Stone Wheel" of the Irish Scots legends, in some of which the stone is called a "razor-wheel." And significantly he appears to have been surnamed in those legends \(\text{Lug,}\)\(^{145}\) i.e., Abel's surname of \(\text{Loki}\) in the Edda. This "Fál's Stone Wheel" in those legends is associated with "Conn-the-Hundred-Fighter," who we have seen was Kon or Cain who extracted the missile; and who perhaps kept it as a trophy, as he never appears himself to have used it as a missile in the Irish legend.

Scene XVI.—Ducking of Thor by Sutt or Seth-Abel in Babylonian and Egyptian Versions.

Babylonian Version of "Adamu the Son of God" defeating Šūtu (Seth or Abel) for capsizing him when fishing on the sea

Striking confirmation of the authenticity of this Eddic tradition of Adam-Thor defeating Loki-Baldr or Sutt (or Seth) on the sea is, I find, extant in the well-known Babylonian or Chaldean epic, dating back probably to about 3000 B.C., on "How Adamu the Son of God broke the hand of Šūtu." This epic, of which a tablet copy in Assyrian of about 700 B.C. was found, had existed amongst the Sumerians about 3000 B.C., as I have shown from the "trial" scene therein being figured on an Early Sumerian seal of about that date (see Fig. 25). But Assyriologists have fancied that it was merely mythological and referred to "the breaking of the wing of the destructive South Wind (Šūtu)," just as Runic scholars have hitherto imagined that the Eddas are merely mythological, and their heroes not human and historical persons.

In this Babylonian epic, the hero is significantly called "Adamu-the-Son-of-God In-Dur," implying that God (the idea of whom seems to have been first imagined by Adam) was already named after Thor or "Ad-of-the-Inn" himself; whilst the human Adam was made "The Son of God"—just as Adam is called in the New Testament "The Son of God." The Father God is also called therein An or Anu in keeping with the Edda which calls Thor's father Oinn. This Babylonian version of the later myth-mongers makes Adamu to be brought for trial before his "Father" for injuring S'ūtu, and in defending his action to call himself also Bili—Bil being as we have seen a title of Adam-Thor.

The Babylonian text reads: 154

Šūtu in destroying anger soused him, Adamu, under:
Unto the abode of the fishes made him sink.
(Adamu said): "O Šūtu thou hast me tricked the worst of all.
Thy hand will I break!"
As with his mouth he had said,
So of Šūtu the hand was broken.
For seven days Šūtu over the land did not destroying rage.
Lord Anu to his minister Ila Abrat spake:
"Why has Šūtu for seven days
O'er the land not destroying raged?"
His minister answered him:
"Bili Adamu, the son of God In-Dur,
Of Šūtu the hand has broken?"
When Adamu before Anu the king drew near Anu saw him and said:
"Come, Adamu, why of Šūtu the hand Didst thou break?"
Adamu to Anu made answer:
"(I) Bili for the house of Bili.
In the midst of the sea, fish, I was catching,
When Šūtu in destroying anger soused me:
Did duck me under to the abode of the fishes;
Made me sink."

[Here the fragment ends.]

Egyptian Version of the Ducking

Asa Thor, who was usually called by his "Sumerian" title of Asar or Asaru 155 by the Egyptians, the "Osiris" of the Greeks, was, according to the Egyptian version, induced by his arch-enemy Set or Suti, the wolf-fiend, to go into a chest, which the latter then threw into the Nile and drowned the king. It is also significant that the Egyptians located Set or Suti, the Seth of Plutarch, "in the South," as in the Babylonian version; and Eden, the home of Sutr-Abel, was south of Cappadocia.

*Hebrew Version of Sutt or Loki's visit to Lord Thor's "Sons of God"

The Hebrew version of this visit of Loki-Sutt (or Lucifer-Satan) to Lord Thor and his sons is found in the opening chapter of Job, a personage who is admitted by Biblical critics to have been a Gentile, and his "Land of Uz" is now seen to be presumably coined from Osk or Oku, Ukhu or Uz, the title of Thor's capital at Vidara or "Heaven" in the Edda and Sumerian records. In that chapter we read:

"Now there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord and Satan came also among them. And the Lord said unto Satan, 'Whence comest thou?' Then Satan answered the Lord and said, 'From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down it.'" (Job i. 6-7.)

This is practically the same scene and the same speech of Sutt or Loki on his entering the assembly hall of Lord Thor. And the statement that Job's sons "feasted in their houses every one on his day and sent and called their sisters to eat and drink with them" is in series with the Edda description of Thor's sons. In the Hebrew "The Lord" who presided at the assembly is made a different person from the long-suffering Job for didactic purposes, just as Lord Thor or In-dara or Ia was later made the "son" of the Father God, who was created by men in the image and name of Thor as Ia or Jah.
BIBLICAL VERSION OF LOKI'S EXPULSION

New Testament Version of the Expulsion of Sutt or Satan from the Gothic Heaven by Miok or Michael

This expulsion of Sutt-Loki, or Satan-Lucifer from the "Heaven" (Himin) capital of the Goths at Vidara by his outraged host Adam-Thor through his crown-prince Miok, Michael or Cain, is disclosed as the Gothic source of the New Testament legend of the casting out of Lucifer "the great Dragon, that old Serpent called the Devil or Satan" from Heaven by "Michael the Archangel" (Jude 9; Rev. xii. 7 f., and cp. Isa. xiv. 12 f.). In the Old Testament there is no reference to Heaven as an abode of the just after death—this is purely Gothic or Hittite in origin.

Greek Tradition of Cain's Banqueting Hall

The memory of this famous banqueting hall, in which Cain dispensed the mead to the Asas (or Gothic king and princes) in their "Heaven" capital, is now seen to be the human historical basis of the legend of the Greek myth-mongers of Ganymede (= Gunn or Cain of the Mead), the descendant of King Dar-Danos, who became the dispenser of mead to the gods, after the Asa Zagg, Zeus or Thor had become deified. Though the hazy Greek memory of the genealogy of Dardanos in Homer's day perpetrates the anachronism of making Ganymede a grandson of Dardanos' son, King Erichthonios, that is as we have found King Gunn, Gan or Cain.
British Arthurian Version of Loki's Visit to King Her-Thor's Hall as "The Green Man"

The Middle English epic poem of "Sir Gawain and the Green Man or Knight" of about A.D. 1360 is now disclosed to have its unknown source in incidents in this Edda and its associates. The Green Man is seen to be Loki or Baldr-Abel, and his cave-home at the "Green Chapel" is in keeping with the Eddic Eden. His insolent entry into the banqueting hall of King Ar-Thur and his knights, his boasting, his stigmatizing the knights as "beardless babes," his altercation with Gawain, and King Ar-Thur's gracious invitation to him, nevertheless, to be seated, are all in agreement with this Edda, though the incidents are somewhat expanded with poetic licence. The grotesque episode of The Green Man, after being beheaded by Sir Gawain, picking up his head "in his hand" and walking off with it, is clearly founded on a misreading of the Eddic narrative of Gunn's or Cain's retort to Baldr that "if we were outside...thy head I would have in my hand." And that this was so is evident in the sequel, which shows The Green Man with his head on and very much alive. At the same time it is noteworthy that in the Indian worship of his she-devil mother Kāli (the Kiol title of the Edda), she is sometimes pictured as going decapitated carrying her head in her hand. His title of "Green" is also evidently derived from the Edda, in which we have seen in Scene IV that the Edenites called their "Earth" Igreen; and their divining-tree at the weird's well of Urd was "evergreen."

In the following extracts from that Arthurian epic I have used the translation into Modern English by Mr
ARThURIAN VERSION OF GAWAIN & GREEN MAN

K. Hare, as the text in Lancashire dialect of the fourteenth century is less readily intelligible. The name "Gawain," which is the usual form in that text, is used in preference to his "Gwayne."

The Green Man intrudes into King Ar-Thur's Banqueting Hall

A Fearsome Master entering stops the mirth:
From neck to loins most stoutly built of brawn,
Mayhap he was the greatest of the earth,
For giantlike so rode he oft by lawn.
Both his hue and favour were the deep ink green,
Even all was green, this fellow and his weeds.

Saluting none, but with scornful glance:
'Where is,' he cried, 'the governor of this rout?
I'll reason with him here if he advances!'
He rolled his eyes and glances on all about.
Arthur the King makes answer fearlessly:
'Warrior, awhile light down our feast to grace,
Then what thy will is we will learn in time and place.'

His Challenge and Results

[The Green Man refusing, claims 'the right to seek some knight in knightly play':]

And Arthur made reply.

'If thou crav'st battle seek thy counter here!'
'Nay 'tis not battle I seek,' he cries agen,
'Among these beardless babes what is to fear?
There's none to match me.

[He then challenges any of them to try a stroke at him with his own axe with its "ell-long" head under penalty of his having a return stroke, and that Loki's weapon in the Edda had "an ell-long attachment" (Scene XV), and we have seen that the axe was a chief weapon of Loki-Baldr. Arthur then uprises as volunteer but is persuaded by Gawain, with the consent of Queen Guen-ever, to allow him to accept the challenge.]

Then Gawain gathers the great axe upon height
And shears through flesh, fat, bone: over his gown.
THE BRITISH EDDA

The green head totters, drops, rolls, and in despite Many start forth to spurn and kick it from their sight...
But that dead body doth not falter nor fall,
But starts forth stiffly where the princes stood,
Grasping with one dead hand as it were wood
To find its head, and clutched and caught it fair,
Makes for the horse the near' st way that it could,
Bearing his own head by the bloodied hair.

The Abode of The Green Man as Eden

The description of the weird cave-abode of The Green Man, with its "Green Chapel," is in series with the Eddic account of the cave-dwellings of Eden which is called in the Edda "Igreen"; and the site of which by the Eddic and other evidence we have been led to locate at Carchemish, with its round ruined covered hill on the bank of the Euphrates at its first ford (see map). And the description in this British epic generally describes the topography of Carchemish:

Anigh a green bank by a river-side
A round knoll in a clearing of the land
That cunningly beside a ford was planned...
Much like a cave or crevice was that knoll,
And all about it grew the lank knot-grass.
Of size to admit a man there was a hole,
And all that place was hollow as a bowl.
‘Is this the Chapel? ’ said the gentle knight (Gawain),
‘Yea, God, at midnight when the skies are foul,
The Devil might tell his matins in good plight
In such a waste as this with not much moon in sight.

Yea, God, this oratory is ill-beseen,
All herb-o'ergrown so fouilly as it lies,
It falls but fit this fellow in the green
Should deal devotion here in devil-wise.
I feel it is the fiend who with his lies
Hath lured me to this chapel of mischance,
This cursed kirk, to slay me in some guise.'
The personal names of several of Arthur's knights, moreover, in this late British Epic version are obviously the old Eddic titles of Thor and his knights expanded to make separate personages to swell the galaxy of knights of the Round Table. Thus Sir Bors is evidently coined from Thor's Eddic title of Bur; Sir Bydver or Bedivere, the Vidar title of Gunn, Cain or Gawain; Bishop Bawdewyn is the canting hypocrite wolf-priest of Eden, Bodo or Wodan; the immoral Lancelot appears to have his title based on Baldr's Eddic descriptive title of "the lance-bearer" or "with his lance all hot"; and the weird Morgyn la Faye evidently bears the name of the Edenite mother weird El or Hline as Maer (or Mary)—the gyn (or woman) of the Fey (or deadly Serpent Fate).

The former wide prevalence of the Green Man legend in Britain seems also evidenced by the frequency even at the present day of the sign-boards inscribed "The Green Man" affixed to old country inns in the environs of London and in the south of England generally.

Scene XIX.—The Binding of Loki or Lucifer by Cain or St Michael in Sumerian, Babylonian, Egyptian and British Versions.

Sumerian Version of the Binding of the Serpent-Dragon

References to the Binding of Loki or Lucifer by Adam as Dar (for the binding by Cain was presumably done under Dar's orders), a scene figured on many of the pre-

Christian monuments of Ancient Britain and Scandinavia, occur in the Sumerian hymns. Thus:

"Dar is the warrior whose lasso overthrows the foe. . . .
The tooth of the Worm [Orm] that comes forth from the mountain (cave), he, Dar, binds." 180

Babylonian Version of the Binding of Baldr or Abel

The Chaldean Babylonians deified this son-paramour of the aboriginal matriarch under the name of Aplu, "the Son" or Tamuz, "the established Son" with his mother's name as Nana—which is also the name of Baldr's wife in the Prose Edda—as their divine Mother-Son, and called the fourth month of their calendar "The Month of The Binding or Imprisonment of Aplu or Tamuz." This month corresponds to our June-July.181

Egyptian Version

The Egyptian version is given in the account of Horus, the young solar hero, and son of Osiris, fettering Set and binding him in chains (Budge, Gods of Egypt, 1, 489).

British Version of the Binding of Loki-Sutt or Lucifer-Satan

Cædmon's vivid description in his Genesis poem of the binding of Lucifer or Satan is obviously based entirely on the Eddic account of the binding of Loki, for there is no reference whatever to the binding of Satan in Genesis or in the other books of the Hebrew Old Testament. He calls the binder "God," a term which we have seen was used by the later Goths as a synonym for Got or God the ordinary spelling of "Goth" in the Edda—the final h in "Goth" only being introduced by the DIFFERENT VERSIONS OF BINDING OF LOKI

Romans, and never used by the Goths themselves. And we shall see later that the actual human historical binder, the Duke Cain-the-Goth was deified by the Babylonians as Mar-Duk or "the Son Duke" their chief god.

Cædmon makes Satan or Lucifer thus describe his bonds:

Alas! could I but use my hands
And have my freedom for an hour
One winter hour, then with this host I would—
But bonds of iron crush me down.
The bondage of my chains is heavy....
Firmly are hell's fetters forged upon me....
Ensna ring links and heavy shackles hold me,
My ways are trammelled up;
My feet are bound, my hands are fastened....
I may not escape out of my bonds
But mighty gyves of tempered iron
Hammered hot press hard upon me.
God has set his foot upon my neck.182

SCENE XX.—Rape of Eve in Sumerian, Indian, Greek and Arthurian Versions.

Sumerian Version of the Rape

The Sumerian, Babylonian and Hittite tradition of this event is seen in the numerous representations of the rescue of Eve for Eden by King Dar on the sacred seals, and doubtless literary references to it will be found in the Sumerian and Hittite psalms when searched for.

Indian Vedic Version of the Rape of Eve,

Remarkable literal confirmation of this Eddic record is found in the ancient commentary on the Vedic hymns of the Eastern branch of the Aryans, dating in its present form to before 400 B.C. but believed to represent literally a much more archaic text. As this version is so historically important in confirming the literal authenticity of the Edda, it is here cited in detail, especially as it is so rich in the Eddic titles of Adam, Eve and Ty or Baldr. Thor is called not only by his Sanskrit title of "Purū of the Sun," the Sanskrit form of the Eddic Bur, but also "The Great Father," "Protector of Men," Priti of Bhinda, i.e., the Eddic "Bur of Vind," and Indra, i.e., "In-Dara" or "Dara of the Inn"; Eve is called Aśi-of-Ur and Priya, i.e., the Eddic Freyia; Baldr is styled Tayo, i.e., the Eddic Ty or Tiva also Bajra, i.e., Baorg of Edda; whilst his mother the matriarch El is called Tayā or "wife of Ty":
THE BRITISH EDDA

Tayā, the chastiser of children, being jealous of his (Purū-ravas's) cohabitation (with Urv-Aśi)
And of the Great Father's passion for her, calling himself Indra, Said to Tayo-Bajra at her side for unyoking them:
'Priti of Bhinda, O Tayo-Bajra mine! Cut (him) off from Priya!'
'That's so,' said Tayo (and) Bajra destroyed Priti's alliance by his craft.
Then bereft of her, The Protector of Men wandered about love-mad.184

Indian Epic Version of the Rape

The Indian Epic version significantly calls the kidnapper of Aśi of Ur by the title of "King of the All (Wishing) Vase" (Viśwa-Vasu), i.e., obviously the All-Wishing Magic Bowl or Holy Grail of Eden which was in Ty's keeping. Moreover he was a Gandharva, or of a class of magical sprites who had water-nymphs as their mistresses, and we have seen that the magic of Heide,
DIFFERENT VERSIONS OF RAPE OF EVE

Wodan and Baldr and their water-nymph weirds is called the Magic of the Gandr. The version, like the above Vedic version in its last line, makes Puru to wander over the world seeking for Urv-Asi, as the lost Euryd-Icê.

Greek Version of the Rape as Euryd-Icê

The early nucleus of this Greek mythic version seems disclosed in the last line of the above Vedic verse: "Then bereft of her, The Protector of Men wandered about love-mad." On this basis certainly the Greek and Roman bards composed their legend of Orpheus wandering lamenting over the world in vain search of his lost wife Euryd-Icê, now seen to be the Urv-Asi of the Sanskrit, and the Euruph-Aessa wife of Pro-Metheus, or Bur-Mioth of the Edda.

Euryd-Icê, it will be remembered, was in this version the "daughter" of Lake-daimon, now disclosed as "The demon Loki" of the Edda, who as the paramour of Mother El might be called "father" of Eve. According to the Greek legend the nymph was the wife of Orpheus, a native of Thrace—a name presumably related to Tros or Troy, Thru(d) of the Edda, the city of Thor—but he is made with poetic licence to have been a contemporary and associate of Jason and the Argonauts, implying perhaps that he was traditionally a great sailor. His wife fleeing from the pursuit of Astraios, a Titan of Darkness, was bitten by a serpent and thus carried to Hades or Hell. Like Eve she was rescued thence by her husband, who descended into Hell, but on the way back with her he is made to lose her.
THE BRITISH EDDA

In the graceful Greek myth Eurydice is then lost for ever, and Orpheus abandons himself to despair:

He with his hollow-lyre allays the pain
Of Love and walking lonely on the shore
When morning rises or when evening falls
He mourns in music sweet ‘ Eurydicē ! . . .'
And with his dying breath ‘ Eurydicē ! ’
‘ Alas Eurydicē ! ’ will call, till all
The river-banks re-echo with her name
And weep and mourn for lost Eurydicē. 186

British Arthurian Version as Lancelot and Guen-Ever

In the later British versions of the Arthurian legend wherein Baldr under the title of Lancelot, a name presumably coined as we have seen from his Eddic title as ‘ The Lance-bearer, ’ is exalted into a knight of King Arthur’s Round Table in series with the Teutonic exaltation of him into one of King Thor’s court of Asas. But even these later British bards, nevertheless, with evidently some glimmering of his real truculent and vicious character, have to make him a libertine, consorting illicitly with Queen Elaine, i.e., the Eddic Hlína title of his mother-paramour El, and also philandering with Ar-Thur’s queen Guen-Ever, i.e., Eve, and his libertinism is apparent in Tennyson’s Idylls, even when glossed over with Early Victorian prudery.

SCENE XXI.—King Thor’s Crusade against Eden in Sumerian and Indian Versions, with Miraculous Passage over Water as Dry Land.

Sumerian Version of Adam’s Fiery Cross as a Crusade

The Sumerian hymns contain many references to King Adar carrying the Wood “ Torch ” symbol of the Sun, and the Sun-emblem in his hand in his invincible expedi­tions of conquest. Thus:

O Lord Adar who liftest up the Torch, who pursuest swiftly the foe. . .
In the right hand of the king, the shepherd of his country,
May the (emblem of the) Sun-God be carried.

Indian Version of Adam's Miraculous Passage over Water as Dry Land

The rescue of Eve forms the next Scene. Here it is noteworthy that a memory of Adam Bur-Miot’s “miraculous” passage over water as “dry land,” which was borrowed by the later Hebrews for Moses’ passage of the Red Sea, is preserved in the ancient Indian Epics, which state that to “the mighty Prithu (or Bur-Mioth), the first Aryan king:

“The waters became solid when he traversed the ocean,
The mountains opened him a path,
His banner passed unbroken through the forests.”

Scene XXII.—Adam’s Rescue of abducted Eve from Eden in Sumerian and Hittite Versions.

Sumerian, Babylonian & Hittite Versions of Adam’s Rescue of Eve

The ancient sacred seals of the Sumerians, Babylonians and Hittites represent this famous scene freely. Dr Ward in his classic work figures over a score of other such seals in addition to that here figured, from the earliest period down to the late Babylonian and Assyrian, and significantly their details are all in accordance with the traditional record preserved in this Edda.
THE BRITISH EDDA

Sumerian Version of Adam's Capture of the Eden Bowl or Holy Grail

The capture of this sacred Stone Bowl of Eden by King Adar-the-Asa is frequently referred to in the ancient Sumerian hymns—as the Sumerians we have found were the Early Aryans or Goths. And its loss is latterly lamented by the later Sumerians, Akkads, Babylonians and Hittites down through the ages, just as its loss and quest are common themes in the British legend of King Arthur.

These Sumerian hymns were written after the idea of God and a Universal God of Heaven (an idea first imagined by the Gentile Goth Adam-Thor) had become developed in the post-Adamite period by the later Sumerians who created their image of God in the image of man, as a king and father. And the man in whose image they created that of their god was Adam himself, as the greatest man and superman the world had known. They also gave God Adam's names and titles of Ia or Jah, In-Dara, Sakh or Zagg (Zeus)—the Sig and Ygg titles of Adam in the Edda; whilst Adam himself they called "The Son of God," a title which he also bears in the New Testament.

One of these fine ancient Sumerian hymns sings, in strict series with the Gothic Edda:

"The strong Darru hero, before whom the foe exists not.
In their midst, like a great wild bull, has he, Adar, lifted up his horns.

Modern Recovery of the Missing Garden of Eden Bowl or Holy Grail of King Arthur

The historicity of the Edda accounts of this famous Magic Bowl of The Garden of Eden, or The Holy Grail of King Arthur, while confirmed by the foregoing and other Sumerian hymns, is further strikingly established, and the cracking of the bowl confirmed by the modern recovery of the actual Bowl itself.

In the excavations at the oldest Sun-temple in Mesopotamia at Nippur by the University of Pennsylvania, deep down below the foundations of the great central tower, which I have personally visited, and seen the hole where the Bowl was extracted, was unearthed the chief portion of this Stone Bowl. The votive inscription cut upon it is in the oldest form of Sumerian writing yet known, and records that the Bowl was deposited there by the priest-king Udug of Kish as a votive offering, and was a trophy captured at Khamasi City, i.e., the old name for Car-Chemish or Gar-Gamish or "The Fort of Gamish"—the Gymis-gard or "Garden of Gymis" of the Edda, 218 wherein Gymi is a title of the Matriarch El of the Bowl—and we have found that Car-Chemish was the site of the Garden of Eden.

In this inscription King Udug, c. 3360 B.C., also records that he was the son of Ginush or Ginegi (Unug or Enoch), son of Cain, who was the son of Bazuzu (Cain, the Bauge of the Edda, see WSAD), who was the son of
THE BRITISH EDDA

Aš-Sagg or Zagg, who I have shown was Asa Sig, Thor’s frequent title in the Edda.

Nippur as the site selected for burying the famous Holy Grail of Adam, Adr or Ottar, is now seen to be owing to that Sun-temple and city having been his especial favourite, as recorded in Early Sumerian hymns. Thus one of these early hymns sings:

“O Lord Adar, in thy city (which) thou lovest, may thy heart be at rest!
In the temple of Nippur, thy city which thou lovest, may thy heart be at rest!” 219

His Holy Grail (of King Her-Thor or Ar-Thur) was thus deposited in the city where his “heart was at rest.”

This deep burying of this actual Bowl (handled by Adam, Eve, El and Abel) by King Udag, the great-grandson of King Thor or Arthur over five thousand years ago, now explains why “The Holy Grail” had totally disappeared, and was made the subject of lamentations down the ages in Babylonia, and of quests by the Early British. The broken state of this trophy Bowl, which has perplexed Assyriologists is also now explained. This Bowl is the oldest personal authentic and inscribed relic of the Early World known—the conjectural dates for inscribed records previous to this are purely fanciful. The Bowl, or rather its chief inscribed portion, which is now in my possession, is the subject of a separate monograph.
DIFFERENT VERSIONS OF CAPTURE OF EDEN

Scene XXIV.—Battle of Eden and Capture of that place by King Dar, Thor, or Adam in Sumerian and Babylonian Versions.

Sumerian & Babylonian Versions of the Battle of Eden & Capture of Eden by King Dar or Thor

In the Sumerian and Babylonian hymns are numerous references to this epoch-making battle; but all date to the period when Adam, Cain, El and Abel had been deified by the myth-mongering priests. The battle is usually called "The Fight of Bel and the Dragon."

It is interesting to find that the old Matriarch El, who is called Ilu, also the Dragon of Evil, is also called in the Babylonian Mother Hubur, thus disclosing the Edenite origin of "Old Mother Hubbard" of the British Nursery tales (imported evidently by the Phœnicians), who was distressed at not finding a bone to feed her Dog, i.e., the Wolf, the dog being the domesticated wolf; and we have seen the Edda describe El as feeding her son Baldr or Abel, as "The Wolf of Fen," or Van.

She is also called in the Babylonian accounts Tiawat, which seems to be the Semitic feminine form of Ty or Tiva, her son-paramour Abel; and strictly analogous to her title in the Indian Vedas of Tayā as the paramour of Tayo, i.e., Ty or Tiva of the Edda,—the final t being merely the Semitic feminine suffix.

Her hordes collected to fight against Heaven and Bel (or "The Lord") are thus described in a late Babylonian text:

"They cursed the day, and went forth by the side of Tiawat, they raged, they plotted, not resting day or night. They raised a conflict, they chafed, they fumed, they set themselves in (battle-) array and made contests."
THE BRITISH EDDA

It is significant that Bel, i.e., the Eddic Bil, title of Thor, Adr or Ottar, in going to meet the host of Mother Hubur "grasped in his hand the plant annihilating poison"—which we have found was the Rowan Apple-tree.

In the older Sumerian and Babylonian hymns are the following amongst other references to this battle:

"Adar, the destroyer of the fortress of the hostile land, descends like the deluge. Thou art) the warrior of the mountain who subjugated . . . [here illegible]. Thou destroyest the life of the Evil One, may thy heart be exalted! In the slaughter of the weapon, the warrior whom thou slayest is utterly destroyed." 227

The slaying of Baldr or Abel by the young Prince Cain in a duel, and of the Old Dragon priestess, the Matriarch herself, by King Her Thor or Ar-Thur, or George, is described in a later scene of the Edda.

This great achievement of Cain in ridding the Early World of its riotous scourge, who blocked the way to the Higher Civilization introduced by Adam and Cain, naturally led to Cain being immortalized as a hero by grateful humanity in all the civilized nations down through the ages.

Thus the Sumerians and Babylonians who latterly deified Cain, under most of his Eddic titles, including Gan or Kan, represent him under his title of "The Son-Duke" (Mar-Duk) as chief warrior or archangel of his Father Ia, In-Duru or An-Dara, whom they had also deified as their Father-god, and celebrated this episode as his slaying the Dragon of Destruction—a favourite theme in their hymns, and frequently engraved pictorially on their sacred seals, in which Abel is sometimes represented as a Lion (Labu, presumably his Lopt title in the Edda). And the later Phœnicians calling him Miklu or Mikal celebrated him on their coins and monuments, and the Ancient Britons on their monuments.
DIFFERENT VERSIONS OF SLAYING OF ABEL

And significantly at Carchemish or the old Eden itself, as now discovered for the first time, most of the massive archaic sculptures picture the slaying of Abel or Baldr as the Lion-Steer of Eden, and the long inscriptions in hieroglyphs are, I find, votive records of various kings regarding Adam-Thor's victory at that old shrine and wailings for the lost Magic Bowl of Eve of Eden.

Egyptian Version

The Ancient Egyptians, deriving as we have found their civilization and letters from the Sumerians or Early Aryans, also celebrated this event in their hymns and litanies as the killing of the Wolf-headed Set or Seth, the demon of Destruction by young Horus of the Sun-cult, the Sun-Hawk warrior, son of Asar or Osiris or Atmu, whom I have shown to be the deified King Adam or Thor. They represented the event also pictorially on their sculptures, etc., as the Hawk-headed young Horus spearing Set as the crocodile, which reptile was an Egyptian form of the Dragon (see Fig. 112). And in later Egyptian art Heru or "Horus" is represented on horseback in spearing Set or Seth, the Dragon, like the modern style of St Michael and the Dragon (see Plate XXV).

Indian Version

The Indian Epic version represents Cain as the most popular of all the demi-gods under the title of "Lord Gan" (Gan-esh), the god of Grain and Wealth, and also "Remover of Obstacles"; and relates that he defended his mother's honour against "The great Deva (or "Devil," i.e., Tiva) the Bull," a title of Baldr in the Edda.

The Vedas represent Val or Baldr as the demonist lord Vala or Pani (i.e., Baldr as the Wolf of Van or Fen), "the stealer of Indra's cows" ("cow" being a Vedic title also for women), who was killed and his forts destroyed by Indra (i.e., In-Dara) himself. The incident was deemed so important that it is repeated about twenty-four times in those Vedic hymns.

Greco-Roman Version

The later Greco-Romans represent this incident in their sculptures (see Figs. 113, 114) as the young Cain under the title of Mithra (naming him after his father, Miot or Mitra) slaying the Bull of Hell, who is attended by the Serpent, Wolf and Scorpion, just as the later Babylonians transferred Bel or In-Dara's exploits to his deified son, Mar-Duk. The young Prince Cain wears the tall Phrygian cap, as on the Hittite sculptures; and BIBLICAL VERSIONS OF SLAYING OF ABEL

"raging Bull" was a title of Baldr-Loki as we have seen. Several of these famous sculptures of the Roman period have been found in London and other parts of Britain (see Figs. 113 and 114).

Old Testament Version

The Semitic perversion in Genesis makes Cain "the brother" and elder brother of Abel, and the first-born of the human race, who became so "wroth" by the Hebrew tribal god El of Eden having "not respect" to his simple offerings of the fruits of the ground, but having accepted the animal sacrifices of Abel that:

"And it came to pass, when they were in the field, that Cain rose up against Abel his brother and slew him."

Thereupon the Hebrew deity cursed Cain for bringing the first death into the world—a world created according to that story only a few years before the birth of Cain and only (by totalling up the ages specified there), 5688 years ago, or in 3761 B.C. Yet, as remarked by Biblical critics, that curse was of so little effect that it is admitted that Cain was the builder of the first city, the city of Enoch or Erech (a city named after his son Enoch, and actually recorded in the Sumerian and Babylonian documents still existing, as having been built by Cain), and thus he was also on Semitic evidence a great and flourishing king.

New Testament Version

This, whilst retailing the old Hebrew version with "the righteousness" of Abel and "the wickedness" of Cain, nevertheless rightly glorifies Cain under his title of Michael the Archangel as the deliverer of Heaven from Satan or Lucifer.
THE BRITISH EDDA

It is also significant that in Revelations Satan as "the King of Hell," who was overcome by St Michael, is called Apoll-yon, a name translated as "The Destroyer," i.e., the actual literal meaning of the Sumerian Bal title of Baldr-Loki or Abel in the Sumerian (see Note 28). Moreover, Abel is "the judge of Hell" in the ancient sacred book of the early Christian fathers entitled "The Testament of Abraham." In this combat between St Michael and Apollyon in art (see Plate XXIV), Cain, as St Michael, is represented as a handsome youth of Aryan type as opposed to Apollyon, an elderly Mephistopheles of non-Aryan physical type. This title of Apollyon was popularized by Bunyan in his Pilgrim's Progress as a name of Satan or Lucifer; and the pilgrim Christian credits Michael for deliverance from him:

"And he with rage
That hellish was, did fiercely me engage,
But blessed Michael helped me."

Ancient Briton Versions

Apart from the literary version preserved in the Edda, the ancient monuments and pre-Roman coins of the Britons contain numerous representatives of Cain as Tascio or St Michael overcoming the Wolf as the foe of the Goats (Goths) and Deer, as in Phoenician coins and seals (see WPOB. 249 f., 334 f.).

Welsh & Irish Versions

A memory of this achievement of Cain seems preserved in the Welsh Triads, which say:

"A resurrection for Brythons
Was made by Gwdion (? Gawain)."
PRINCE CAIN OR GAWAIN AS ST MICHAEL

And it was by the command of "St Michael-the-Victor" that St Patrick the Scot was sent to Ireland to expel the snakes (serpent-cult) from that isle.

Arthurian Legend Version

Cain's slaying of Abel is now seen to be the Eddic source of the slaying by Sir Gawain of the Green Man in the Arthurian legend. The fantastic finale of the decapitated Green Man, walking off, carrying his head in his hand, was, we have seen, evidently owing to a whimsical reading by the later British bards of the Eddic text regarding a previous bloodless altercation.

The eulogy of Sir Gawain in the Morte D'Arthur of Thornton's manuscript says:

"This was Sir Gawayne the gude, the gladdeste of othire,
And the graciouseste gome that undire God lyffede,
Mane hardyeste of hands, happyeste in armes, . . .
His konynge, his knyghtode, his kyndly workes,
His doyng, his doughtynesse, his dedes of armes."

Cain or St Michael, the Victor over Satan in Pre-Christian Ancient & in Modern Britain, the Continent, Syria & Asia Minor

Michael the Archangel as the conqueror of Satan, was one of the greatest, if not the greatest, of the saints of Early Christianity, which made Hell a place of everlasting torment for evil-doers, instead of the mere abode of the dead, as the Hebrews and classic Greeks and Romans had come to regard it.

Most of the early churches in Asia Minor, Syria and the West, and especially in Britain, were dedicated to him. But they were usually on sites of ancient pre-Christian sanctuaries already dedicated to him. Thus the latest authority on St Michael writes: "Given an ancient dedication to St Michael, and a site associated with a headland, hill-top or spring, on a road or track of early origin, it is reasonable to look for a pre-Christian sanctuary." 232 These pre-Christian sanctuaries in the West were presumably founded by the Phœnicians, who stamped Michael's effigy and name on their coins as we have seen, and who gave their early port, with its Sun-temple at the tin-mines of Cornwall, the name of "Michael's Mount," 233 just as the Early Britons or Brito-Phœnicians represented him on their monuments. 234 And St Michael churches are not infrequent on British sites associated with the great Orm or Worm-Serpent legends, as at Ormesby in Norwich, and Appleby (or Abel's-by) in Westmorland.

Significantly also, St Michael is always represented in art as a handsome youth "with golden hair" (as in the Eddic description of Cain), and usually wearing a chaplet decorated with St George's Cross, and armed with a lance and a shield bearing the same Cross. 235 And it is noteworthy that his festival-day, the 29th of September, is also the festival of St Gaiane, who also defended the honour of maidens, and whose name is obviously a variant of Gawain or Cain. 236 On the identity of Tubal Cain with King Cain, see Appendix VI.

Scene XXVII.—Chaldean Lamentations on Death of Baldr or Abel re "Dying God" theory.

Chaldee Lamentations for the Death of Baldr or Abel

The Lamentations of the Semitic Chaldees for the death of Abel form a large collection of hymns of the CHALDEAN LAMENTATION FOR DEATH OF ABEL

Mother-Son cult written in the Babylonian tablets from about 3000 B.C. downwards.

In the following extracts from these Chaldee wailings for Abel, the title of the latter is usually rendered by translators as "Tamuz" or "The Established Son" (the son-paramour of the Mother weird), after the Hebrew form of the name used by Ezekiel in describing the wailings for him by the Jewish women in Jerusalem; but I use the better-known Semitic synonym of "Ablu the established son," which is the equivalent of "Abel," the Abal, Bal and Ibila of Sumerians. His father, too, is significantly called therein Sirtur (i.e., the Eddic "Surtr" and "Surtar"); and his mother is variously Gula (the Eddic Gull, Gol and Kiol) and Nana (the name of Baldr's wife amongst the Wodanists), In-Nini (the Ninni of Edda, also Ilu and Ilatu (the Eddic El, Ell, Eldi and Ól). The reference to the loss of his Stone Bowl is also significant, and similarly his death on the Euphrates, in agreement with his death at Eden or Carchemish on the Upper Euphrates, as detailed in the Edda.

"The mother In-Nini, even as his mother for him that comes not, wails.
The Ilu Queen for her husband wails.
For the brother who slumbers the city wails,
Alas! O shepherd Lord Ablu the established son.
For the far removed there is wailing,
Ah me, my child, the far removed
My anointer, the far removed.
The queen of the temple, who cries Alas! my husband.
    Alas! my son.
A courtesan compassionate am I.
In the temple high and low there is weeping,
Wailing for the house of the lord, they raise.
For the perishing 'wedded' ones, for perishing children it is;
The dark-headed people create not."
"Him of the plains, why have they slain?
The shepherd, the wise one,
The man of sorrows, why have they slain?
The lady of the vine-stalk with the lambs and calves languishes,
The lord shepherd of the folds lives no more.
The husband of the Ilu Queen lives no more,
The lord of the cattle-stalls lives no more!"

"In the flood of the shore of the Euphrates, why hast thou taken him?
Established son art thou, thou who wast hurried away,
Cruelly wast carried away.
Consort of In-Nini, son of Sirtur, who wast cruelly carried away.
The shining Su-me (or Bur-me, Stone Bowl) from thy side is divested.
Because the established son has gone forth, in his sheepfold there is no creating."

Edenite Semitic Origin of the supposed "Dying god" Wailings

Here we have now disclosed through the Edda the Edenite human origin of the supposed "Dying god" wailings, which it is the present fashion for theoretical writers on comparative mythology and religion to interpret as magical rites for procuring the return of a new year's vegetative life after the season of drought and decay. And it is further assumed that these people were in the habit of periodically killing their kings for these magical rites, as a sacrifice for the people, with the sacramental eating of his body.

On the contrary, these lamentations for the death of Abel or "Tamuz" are now seen to be evidently merely the sorrowful observances of the anniversary of the slaying of their old tribal Chaldean chief and sacrificing serpent-priest of their forefather in Eden—at the hands of the reforming Aryan Prince Cain or St Michael—by the Semitic descendants of Abel, Seth or Baldr and El, as described in the Edda. And it is paralleled by the present-day wailing of the Hebrews at the walls of Jerusalem, in commemoration of a later great historic old Hebrew tribal bereavement.

SCENE XXVIII.—Capture and Slaying of the Dragon Priestess of Eden by Adam-George in Sumerian, Babylonian, Phœnician, Egyptian, Indian, and Hebrew Versions, and the hero as Adam or St George of Cappadocia.

Sumerian & Babylonian Versions

The Sumerian and Babylonian hymns and litanies are full of this epoch-making event and gratitude for it. Thus a Sumerian hymn refers to it:

"Thou Adar who destroyed the life of The Evil One, may thy heart be exalted." 252

And the scene of Adar or In-dara slaying the Dragon is frequently represented on Sumerian, Babylonian and Hittite sacred seals (see, e.g., Figs. 117 f.). Later this achievement was credited by the Babylonians to Adar or Bel’s son Mar-Duk, i.e., Cain, as “The Son-Duke” or Archangel, who slew the young Dragon Aplu or Abel, who is significantly called “the young Hydra” in the Central Edda lay.

In these later Babylonian accounts of the polytheistic period, when the idea of a God, first imagined by Adam, had become adopted by the Chaldees and extended by them to include their deified Mother-Son, El-Abel-
Wodan and other personages deified by their priests, this old Mother-priestess as the Dragon is now considered a separate she-devil from their ancient El, and is generally called Tiawath, as we have seen, also "Mother Hubur" (Hubbard), and described as the "Plague, the Fearful Dragon, the Dragon which shines brightly, the female spirit who devours with a Serpent's mouth." Bel Mar-Duk as the champion of Heaven receives instructions from "the council of gods in Heaven":

"Go thou and cut off Tiawath's life-breath!"

Significantly in the Assyrian version he is armed with "the invincible club," spear, dagger and "the net," and "the plant which annihilates poison," which we have seen was the Rowan Apple-tree. The leading incidents in the fight and slaying of the Dragon according to the Assyrio-Babylonian tradition are indicated in the following extracts from the long original texts translated by Professor Sayce:

"He (Mar-Duk) made a snare to enclose the Dragon of the sea. . . .
His hand brought the snare near unto the bow of his father Anu. . . .
Then Bel opened his snare and enclosed her. . . .
He swung the club, he shattered her. . . .
He mastered her heart, he bound her and ended her life,
He threw down her corpse, he stood on it." 253

All this, it will be seen, is in essential agreement with the earlier authentic tradition preserved in the Eddas, and "the standing on" the corpse compares with the Eddic "stept over." And it discloses that the legend of the Slaying of the Dragon by Adar-George did not arise as a priestly myth of the Sun vanquishing the Demon of Darkness, and Rain and Mist, as hitherto supposed, but was founded on the actual historical human achievement of Adam-George in his vanquishing the Serpent-Dragon priestess in his civilizing war against Eden.

Phœnician Version

The later Phœnicians represented Adam-George as mounted on horseback and spearing the Dragon (see Fig. 119); and it was they presumably who brought to their colony in Britain the mounted version of that legend.

Egyptian Version

In the Egyptian version the Great Serpent of Evil and arch-enemy of Ra the Sun-god, and slain by the latter (i.e., Rōa or Rab, title of Thor in Edda, and the Rāvas of the Vedas), is usually called Apap, and supposed to be a male, though the cat’s head sometimes given it would rather imply feminine gender. Its titles, moreover, of Hem-Hem, Serem-tau and Bed-eshu seem to equate with the Eddic titles of El as Hymi, Hrym and Gram—the Sarama of the Vedas—and Bud of the above Eddic lays.

The Egyptian accounts of the slaying of this Serpent by Ra agree generally with the Edda. Ra captured the Serpent by fetters, and “Ra pierceth thy head, he slitteth up thy face, he divided thy head, and it is crushed in thy land, thy bones are smashed to pieces.” And the chapter in the book on its overthrow is entitled “Defling Apap with the left foot,” in keeping with the Eddic statement that her corpse was “stepped over.”

Striking confirmation of the Eddic accounts are found in the scenes pictured on the beautiful alabaster sarco-phagus of Seti I, the father of Rameses the Great, about 1370 b.c., now in the Soane Museum in London. Several of the details of the scenes of the capture of this Serpent on this ancient Egyptian monument, namely the mighty hand, etc., now receive their long-forgotten explanation by means of our British Edda (see Figs. 125 and 129). According to the Egyptian legend after the hooking of the Serpent "twelve strong-armed gods" were unable to hold the chain, and the Serpent was escaping, when "there arose a 'Hidden Hand,' which grasped the chain and prevented it moving." That hand is now seen to be Cain's.

Indian Versions

The Vedas are full of references to Indra (i.e., In-Dara or Andara) slaying the great Serpent demon therein styled Ahi, Ahi Budhnya (the Bud of the Edda) or Vritra, "the Brute." It is represented in the Vedas as a male whom Indra kills by striking with his bolt, and he shatters its fortresses.

The Indian Epics, preserving her original female character, represent Bur of Vindi, as Prithu Vainya, as justifying the slaying of the Earth-Mother who had caused untold misery to the early world, in the following words:

"When the happiness of many is secured by the destruction of one malignant being, the death of that being is an act of virtue." 255

Buddha also in the collection of old-world legends, with which he illustrated his sermons, retails the form of the legend with death of this sanguinary sacrificing matriarch which was current in India in his day in the fifth century B.C. Her name Kālī well equates with the Eddic Kiol, Gal and Goll, and with the Sumerian Gul or Gula. He says rather gruesomely:
BIBLICAL VERSIONS OF ADAM SLAYING SERPENT

"See Kālī trussed for burial, loathsome sight! Clumsy and huge she lies, the crow-black troll. Broken her limbs, and from her broken skull The clotted brain like curd oozing white. Such, such is mortal Woman!"

Hebrew Versions

The Serpent we are told in the Hebrew Genesis was already in the Garden of Eden before "The Fall of Man," (and thus presumably at home there), and could speak, and that it "was more subtil than any beast of the field," and that it was told that "the seed of the woman (Eve) shall bruise thy head." This latter "prophecy" presumably referred to the later legend of the Gentile Cain's hooking of the Serpent or Serpent-priestess El.

The slaying of the Serpent by Adam is referred to several times in the Hebrew Old Testament under Adam's title of Iā or Jah, i.e., the Sumerian Iā synonym reading of Adam's In-Duru or In-Dara title—under which he was latterly deified, and which Aryan title was bodily borrowed by the Hebrews as the later title of their tribal god. Thus, in Psalm lxxiv. 13:

"Thou (Jah) brakest the heads of the Dragons in the water, Thou brakest the heads of the Leviathan in pieces."

And Job says, xxvi. 13 (Revised Version) and xli. 1:

"His hand hath pierced the fleeing Serpent. . . . Canst thou draw out the Leviathan with a hook, Or his tongue with a cord which thou lettest down? Canst thou put a hook in his nose?"

Adam-George of Cappadocia & Eden as the Historical Human Original of St George & the Dragon & the Patron Saint of England

This victory over and slaying of the Dragon matriarch-priestess of the sanguinary bestial cult of Eden by Adam-George of Cappadocia is now disclosed as the human historical origin of the legend of St George and the Dragon. And it receives historical, inscriptional and relatively contemporary proof by the votive record engraved on the captured magic stone-bowl of Carchemish or Eden, by King Udug, the great-grandson of Adam-Thor, to whose memory it was dedicated at the foundation of the great central Sun-Temple at Nippur in Mesopotamia, as we have seen under "The Holy Grail" episode. This dedication attests the immense historical importance which King Adam's early descendants placed upon his victory over Eden.

The conspicuous use of the Red Cross in this engagement is also significant and confirmatory of his identity with St George, whose name he actually bears in some of the verses. And the numerous early Sumerian, Babylonian and Hittite seals representing this event, pictured the Cross in the form of a St George's Cross, and only very rarely as a St Andrew's Cross, which latter originally was the St George's Cross tilted over, as carried in action.257

The great patron saint of England is thus disclosed to be none other than Adam, the much maligned by Hebrews and through them by modern Christians, in ignorance of his identity with the great Gentile Gothic King Adam-George of Cappadocia, the Patron Saint of England, Andrew of the Scots, and Prometheus, the greatest of world-kings, who raised the fallen men of the old pre-Adamite world to the Higher Civilization.

Moreover, we also now find that Adam-Thor, under his Sumerian title of Zagg or Zakh, the Sig of the Edda, is the historical original of "Jack the Giant-Killer" of our nursery tale, which is seen to be an infantile version of one of the greatest historical events in the life of our ancestral Early Aryans in establishing for us the Higher Civilization.

SCENE XXIX.—Adam, Her-Thor or Ar-Thur's Enthronement as Victor in Eden, in Sumerian, Hittite and Cædmon's British Versions, and on the Rōm title for Eden and its Edenites.

Sumerian Version of King Dar's (or Adam-Thor's) Enthronement in Eden

In the Sumerian psalms are references to King Dar's or Adam-Thor's enthronement "on the throne of the shrine supreme," which is obviously in Eden after his victory there, as well as numerous representations of the event on the sacred Sumerian seals picturing his enthronement on the Lion Throne (see Figs. 134 f.). Thus it is referred to in some psalms:

"On the throne of the shrine supreme, even on his (Dar's) seat,
Is a brilliant light when he lights it up.
At the festival they establish him joyfully on his seat. . . .
O Lord, a station on high (is thy habitation). . . .
Dar, the warrior of the mountain who subjugatest.
Who carried away the land of the disobedient, may thy heart be exalted!" 259
THE BRITISH EDDA

It appears to be from this enthronement at the head-centre of the Lion-tribe at Eden that Adam Dar Dan came to be represented as seated on a Lion-throne with his foot upon a lion.

Hittite Version of his Enthronement at Eden

The Hittite version of King Adam-Thor's enthronement in Eden is well seen not only in the Hittite sacred seals, but also in the magnificent Hittite sculpture of him enthroned on the Lion-throne (see Plate XXVII), which was actually found at Carchemish or Eden.

Ancient British Version of Adam's Victory over Satan (Sutt) in Eden & his Enthronement there

Adam's victory over the historical human Satan in Eden and the "cherubims with flaming swords" and his assumption of sovereignty there as enthroned King of Eden, was clearly known to the British poet Cædmon or Cadmon, and presumably so through the Eddas; as his metre is in the ordinary Eddic measure and the most of his words are later dialectic forms of the Eddic, and his name "Metod" for God as the Creator, is suggestive of the Mjölnir title of Adam-Thor, who was latterly deified by the Aryans. In his poem on Genesis, Cædmon, even on being Christianized, cannot divest himself of the old true tradition of his Briton ancestors regarding Adam, and makes Satan (i.e., Sut or Seth) on being dispossessed lament, saying:

"That is my greatest sorrow,
That Adam, wrought of earth,
Should hold my firm-set throne
And live in friendly joy, while we Endure this bitter woe in hell." 261

276
"ROME" TITLE FOR EDEN & MOTHER-SON CULT

Rōm or "Rome" title for Eden and its Wolf-tribe votaries of the Mother-Son Cult

In Sumerian, the abode of the oracular priestess, from about 3100 B.C. onwards, is called Edîn or Etîn (WSAD. 69, WISD. 33 f.), the latter form being in series with the Eddic Iætun name for "Eden." And significantly this Sumerian word-sign was also given the synonym word-form of Rum (Br. 4524 and 3; Prince S.L., 277), which is in agreement with the Rōm title in this Eddic lay.

Rōm of the Edda is thus seen to have been a synonym for Eden and its Wolf-tribe priestess and Chaldee people. This now appears to explain the legend that the mythical founders of the new Rome in Italy, Romulus and Remus, were "wolf-suckled," suggesting that they were of the Mother-cult of the Wolf-tribe of the Rōms; and the Italian physical type is the same non-Aryan type as that of the aboriginal dark Chaldeans, Lycians, etc., the so-called Mediterranean or Iberian race. Moreover, Rōm or Romît was the title of the Set-Wolf and Serpent-worshipping aborigines of Ancient Egypt (MDC. 43); and "Romany" is the title of the dark non-Aryan fortune-telling gipsies and weirds of Roumania and elsewhere of the "Mediterranean" or "Iberian" race; and the present-day Moslem title of "Rūm" for Asia Minor and for their religious capital at Constantinople was not borrowed from the Italian "Rome" as is generally supposed.

It thus appears that the original head-centre seat of the Mother-Son-cult, with its shaven and befrocked matriarchist priests and priestesses, inveterately antagonistic to the monotheistic idea of God and to the advance of the Higher Knowledge and Civilization, was from prehistoric time immemorial called "Rom" or "Rome," and the home of "Mother Mary."

SCENE XXX.—Regeneration of Eden and Uplifting of Man by Adam in Sumerian and Babylonian Versions.

Sumerian & Babylonian Versions of the Regeneration of Eden by King Dar or Adam

There are frequent references in the Sumerian hymns to King Dar or Adam's "scattering the seed" of his Higher Civilization and exalting of man, and his clemency towards his quondam enemies. Thus, for example, in the same hymn which celebrates his capture of the Stone Bowl of Eden, Dar, now semi-deified, is acclaimed as:

Dar, exalter of man, who makes joyful his side,
The Lord who (grants) pardon to his (conquered) city,
Has driven his chariot over the mountain, has scattered wide the seed.
(Men) altogether have proclaimed his name daily for sovereignty over them.
(Thou wert) the warrior of the mountain who subdued. 265

This annexation and transformation of Eden, Urdu or Ur into a real paradise by Adam In-Dara and his son Cain (the Son-Duke, Mar-Duk), now explains how Urdu or "Eridu" came in the later Sumerian and Babylonian hymns to be called a "home" of these two deified Gothic heroes; and in secular literature was "The Land of the Amorites," a people whom I have shown in previous works to have been a branch of the Hittites and of Gothic race.

Indeed King Adam Dar's magnanimous forgiveness of the Abelites, Balderites or Tamuzites, with permission to return to the reformed Eden when they themselves had become law-abiding and somewhat reformed, with a reformed new generation of Mother-Son leaders, to dwell amongst Adam's civilized "Sons of God," seems to be reflected even in the later hymns of the Chaldees themselves, though they suppress therein all reference to Adam's name. Thus these later Chaldee hymns sing:

"Innini [The Second ?] to her women cried:
'In Heaven there is Light! On Earth there is Light!
Magnified is he, magnified is the Lord!'...

In Urdu (Urd or Eden) its brick walls reposed,
Upon Urdu a faithful eye he cast.
There the Valiant in his boat descended...
Where grass was not, there grass (grain) is eaten,
Where water was not, water is drunk,
Where the cattle sheds were not, cattle sheds are built. . .
The spade labours not, and the granaries shall be heaped." 265

Scene XXXI.—Advent of the Goths under King Cain into Mesopotamia as "The Sumerians," and their Colonization and Civilization of Mesopotamia, Persia, Indus Valley, Egypt, Crete, and Europe, and the Site of King Arthur's Camelot.

The full account of the advent of the Goths into Mesopotamia as the so-called "Sumerians" of Assyriologists, and their colonization and civilization of the world, is detailed in my recent work, The Makers of Civilization in Race and History, from the contemporary and other official historical Sumerian, Babylonian and Egyptian records.

Within a century after King Cain's annexation of Mesopotamia and establishment there of his chief sea-capital at Enoch, we find about 3245 B.C. Cain's grandson as priest-king of the city of Kish at an old junction with the Tigris, and presumably Emperor of Mesopotamia, as he deposited the trophy stone-bowl of Eden or "Holy Grail" of his great-grandfather Her-Thor, to whom he dedicated it as Zagg ("Sig") at the great Sun-Temple of Nippur, which he built about fifty miles up the river from Enoch city. This city, generally known as "Nippur," after the Arab hamlet of Niffar near its site, was presumably founded by King Adam or Ar-Thur himself, as it is frequently called in the Sumerian hymns "the beloved city of Lord Adar"—Adar being a frequent title for Thor in the Edda. This is supported not only by its having been selected as the site for depositing King Arthur's Holy Grail; but also by its official name in the later records being "City of Lord Zakh, Zax or Sakh," i.e., a later form of spelling King Adar's title of Zagg or Sagg, his Sig title in the Edda.268

Colonization of Persian Gulf & Indus Valley by King Cain's Gothic Descendants as the First Phœnicians Dynasty about 3100 B.C.

By about 3100 B.C., we find the First Phœnicians Dynasty as a branch of the Aryan Sumerians, and descended from Hercules, and the chief seafaring branch of the Sumerians, established in the vast palatial city-port of Lagash on the Persian Gulf, with other capitals at Kish and Erech,269 and as a mighty imperial colonizing state. The sites of two of their great colonies in the Indus Valley have recently been unearthed with vast palatial remains, including numerous official and private seals from their cemeteries, which seals I have deciphered and translated, and which with their culture I have termed "Indo-Sumerian," and described in a previous work.270
Colonization & Civilization of Egypt & Western Europe, including Britain, by Third Phœnician Dynasty of Aryans under Sargon I and his son Menes, about 2720 B.C.

In my work above cited, I have demonstrated by the new historical and contemporary inscriptive evidence that the Third Aryan-Phœnician Dynasty under Sargon the Great, and his father and grandfather, were predynastic kings of Egypt, and that the son of Sargon I was Menes, the founder of the First Dynasty of Egypt and the so-called "first introducer of hieroglyphs into Egypt for continuous writing," and that these hieroglyphs themselves, as well as the radical elements in the Ancient Egyptian language, were derived from the Sumerian picture-writing and language. 271

And these adventurous Aryan-Sumero-Phœnicians and Gothic mariners from Mesopotamia, Asia Minor and Egypt had already scoured the unknown Western Seas under Sargon and Menes and established colonies along the Western Mediterranean of Europe, and out beyond the Pillars of Hercules to the tin-mines of Cornwall in Ancient Britain. 272 The much remoter dates for the Sumerians in Mesopotamia, and for the date of Menes of the First Egyptian Dynasty at present in vogue amongst writers on Sumerian, Mesopotamian and Egyptian history are found to be merely fanciful conjectures, and not founded on concrete historical fact. 272

Arthurian Legendary "Camylot" as "Gimli"

The name "Gimli" or "Gimle," which Adam Her-Thor or Ar-Thur appears to have applied to this regenerated Eden or Garden of Eden, or to a new capital, further down the river, obviously discloses the long-lost original site of the famous capital of Camylot or Camelot of King Arthur’s legend—the final t is in series with the final d, the Sumerian locative affix often affixed to place and personal names in the Edda. Camylot was one of the chief cities at which King Arthur held his Court with Queen Guen-Ever, Sir Gawain and his other knights and ladies in the legends of the Welsh, Britons and Bretons.

The descriptions of the festivities at King Arthur’s court at Camylot, with its sworn brotherhood, when on holiday there in the gay old world of our Gothic ancestors as seen through the glasses of mediæval European knight-errantry, reflects much of the above picture in the Edda:

"Arthur the king holds court at Camylot
Upon a Christmastide; 266 his princes there
Were from their many realms together got
To hold rich revel that is the flout of care.
Quick as the nimble creatures of the air
They met in medley of the tournament
Oft times, beneath the fluttering banners rare,
And thronged back thence to Court, the long day spent,
Sworn brothers, all alike to newer merriment.

With all the joy in life they met together,
Each with the lady to himself most dear,
Caught by the Christmastide into one tether.
Comely was Arthur King, by dais there,
And of all ladies loveliest, Guin-Ever.
Arthur was lofty of spirit, brave in fight:
His men attended by the dais this New Year,
His progress, brought to the hall many a knight.
Agravayne and Gawayne, pillars of fame
Each side the Queen, attending her behests." 267
THE NAME "EDDA"

The name "Edda," by which this body of ancient Gothic epic poems is now generally known, has hitherto been the subject of many improbable and fantastic conjectures. It was applied to the prose work of the Icelander Snorri by later writers, though it is uncertain whether he used it for that work himself, as that title is generally stated to be first found written on a MS. copy of his treatise of about fifty years after his death. Nor is it found as a title on any of the older MS. poems of these epics.

The word, so spelt with a double d, ordinarily means in Icelandic only "great-grandmother and mother" (VD. 114); and it could not be shown how this meaning could aptly designate these epics. Even now, when our new literal translation and rearrangement of the epics by our new historical keys shows the unsuspected prominence of the Eden Matriarch in her inveterate conflict with Thor and his Early Aryan Goths throughout the poems, such an origin for the title is put out of question, as it is neither descriptive of the collection which celebrate the victories of the Goths and not the Edenites, nor is the Matriarch ever once called "Edda" in any of the poems. Nor does that word occur in any of the poems themselves, except in a single odd and later ballad, which in both its character and diction is really outside the genuine "Eddic" cycle, except for one stanza. This ballad called "The Rig's Tale" (Rigs Thula), which is supposed from its spelling to date from about A.D. 1200, does not exist in the Codex Regius and other collections of the "Edda," but is only found on a stray leaf at the very end of the Codex Wormianus. It purports to describe domiciliary visits by King Home-Daler (i.e., Thor) to his subjects, but it credits him with immoral behaviour entirely foreign to his real character, as uniformly attested throughout the whole body of the genuine epic poems without a single exception, and thus betrays its spuriousness. It moreover contains many inconsistencies (see CPB. 1, 235). And to crown all, the name "Edda" therein is merely applied to an old peasant woman in its normal sense of "great-grandmother," and not to the Matriarch Frigg, El or Gul, who does not appear in it at all.

The latest notion on the origin and meaning of the word "Edda" is that of the authors of the chief magnum opus and "established authority" on the Edda, the Corpus Poeticum Boreale (I. xxvi. f.; II 514 f.). They concoct a fantastic hypothesis resting on a string of obviously false conjectures. Starting with the "Teutonic" theory of the European Family of Languages and of the Edda they believe that the name "Edda" is a corruption of the German Erde or Ertha or Erda "Earth," which name they imagine was possibly applied to the Edda by the Germans, as the fancied custodians of the original Gothic epics, because Tacitus, so they say, wrote that "the Germans of his day make Terra Mater the mother of Tuiscon, whose son is 'Mare';" and that perhaps they called their old songs Ertha or "Earth," and that perhaps a Scandinavian heard a German trader sing a snatch of one of these "Earth" songs, and then he puts it into his own tongue as neatly as he can, and the result is "Edda." (!)

But the facts are quite otherwise. Tacitus did not mention "Mother Earth" at all as an ancestress claimed by the Germans. What he wrote was: "They (the Germans) celebrate an earth-born god Tuisco and his son Mannus, as the origin of their race, as their founders" (Tacitus, Germania, trans. Church and Brodribb, 88). Besides, the Germans never were, as we have seen, the custodians or originators of these Gothic epics, nor even knew the script (the Runes) in which they are enshrined, nor did they, whilst worshipping Wodan and Baldr and Donner, or Thunder, even know the name of Thor in their own indigenous Sagas and monuments. Nor could the word Ertha "Earth" (see WSAD., Sumerian Arata, "Earth," 17 f.), with its radical r, ever become "Edda" as has been suggested.

On the other hand, on freshly examining the actual facts in the light of the new evidence and new historical keys, I found that all unsuspectedly the word "Edda" as a title for these epics does actually occur and freely so in the text of the oldest of all these epics, namely The Sibyl's Vision. It there occurs in the form of Eda (the Runic letter d was often written in old MSS. as a double d), and is used to evidently denote the body of the great epic, in a constantly-recurring interrogative refrain used by the Sibyl to emphasize critical points and to introduce new developments. This refrain is Vitod ër enn Eda, hvat? which literally reads: "Wit ye then (or yet) the Eda, what?" and which I have Englished as:

"Know ye yet the Edda?
Know ye yet it all?"

284

in order to emphasize its pause; as the Sibyl obviously halted here for a period for dramatic effect.

This name Eda for the great collection of ancestral hymns of the Goths in the West seems probably the equivalent of the title Veda, applied by the Eastern branch of the Aryans to their great kindred collection of ancestral hymns in the Sanskrit, which significantly deal mainly with the same identical subject as the Edda, namely the rise and exploits of the Early Aryans under their deified Lord Indra (i.e., In-Dara, title of Thor), who is also called in the Vedas Śakra, and in the Pali Sakko (i.e., the Sig or Sigr title of Thor), and of his victories over the Serpent of the Deep, his slaying of evil giants and demolishing their citadels, and his protection of agriculture.

Veda in Sanskrit, from Vid, "perceive, know," is the equivalent of Fido of the old Greek meaning "to view, see, perceive," and therefore "to know," and literally "Faith" on the principle of "seeing is believing"; and these roots with their cognates in all the leading branches of the Aryan family of Languages ancient and modern, including Ancient Egyptian, I have shown to be derived from the Sumerian Bid, Biad, or Fid, possessing these identical meanings (see my Sumer-Aryan Dictionary, pp. 37 f. and 77—the initial labial B or F being dialectically interchangeable with the labial V (see my Aryan Origin of the Alphabet, 30 f.).

Now, significantly, the initial F early dropped out of the Western or European branch of the Aryan Languages, as represented by the Greek. Thus Fido became latterly in Greek Eidō, with derivate Idea. Thus we apparently get the Eddic Gothic Eda as the dialectic Western equivalent of the Sanskrit Veda for this sacred collection of ancestral poems celebrating the rise of the Aryans.

It would thus seem that the Gothic term "Eda" designated these poems as "The Knowledge (including History) of their ancestral Aryans, and their object of 'Faith.'" Moreover this name Eda is cognate also with Idyl, a short descriptive, pastoral poem, from the Greek Eid-ullion, diminutive of Eidos, "view, appearance, descriptive." And no more appropriate definition of Eda, or "Edda" could be given than Idyl or Idyllic.

As the spelling "Edda" with the double d has now been so long current, I have retained it in my translations and in the descriptive notes and title.
THE BRITISH EDDA

III

THE HOME OF THE EDDA IN BRITAIN

The original home of the Edda epic was, as we have found, Cappadocia in Asia Minor, the home of St George, the patron saint of England. But the medieval form in which the Edda text now exists shows that that epic had early been transplanted into and naturalized in Britain. It was presumably carried westwards there, via the Mediterranean and St George's Channel, in the early pre-Christian period by colonizing Aryan Phoenician Barats or seafaring British Goths, as their precious ancestral heirloom, and handed down there through the centuries in writing, from generation to generation, and becoming in the process from time to time modernized in its diction, to adapt it to the evolution of the Briton or English tongue.

It has already been described in the Introduction how the Edda MSS. were found preserved in the remote fastnesses of Iceland on the introduction of Christianity there; that there was wholesale destruction of Ancient Briton MSS. in the British Isles by the early Christian missionaries, who stigmatized those MSS. as subversively "pagan"; that Iceland first derived its writing, books and civilization from the West of Scotland and Ireland;¹ that the topography, scenery, towns, people, flora and fauna, including serpents, and climate described in the Edda are foreign to Iceland; that the Edda is of the pre-Christian period, exhibiting no traces whatsoever of Christian influence; that like all very ancient poetry it is anonymous; that the verse and writing is Gothic, and the language is of the Gothic family to which Early English and Anglo-Saxon belong; and that leading English and Scandinavian scholars on the Edda admit that many of the critical words therein are neither Icelandic nor Norse, but English;² and that "the great majority of the poems were composed . . . in the British Isles—the greater number probably in northern England, but some of it may be in Ireland, in Scotland, or in the Scottish Isles: very few Edda lays seem to have arisen outside the British Isles. We find in most of the poems a goodly number of words which are of English origin, and cannot be shown to have been in general use in Norway or Iceland.”¹

Yet, strange to say, all these Eddic scholars, whilst holding that the Edda lays were almost wholly composed in the British Isles, nevertheless conjecture that the composers were not Britons at all, but were problematic Norwegian bards or priests, who are supposed to have been resident in Britain, and had picked up British words.² That notion has arisen through Eddic scholars having hitherto universally believed that the Edda was merely mythological, and the invention of Norse priests and bards, merely because the chief heroes, Thor and Wodan, were believed to be exotic to Britain, and purely Norse and Germanic or Teutonic gods (even although the name Thor is unknown in German mythological literature); and because all Eddic scholars have blindly followed Snorri in his mythological notions of the epic, and in his gross misreadings and perversions of critical stanzas of the Edda texts.

On the other hand, we have seen that those two personages, Thor and Wodan, were strictly human, and were equally the popular pre-Christian heroes and deified heroes or gods in Ancient Britain and amongst Anglo-Saxons; and that whilst the Britons and Anglo-Saxons were of the same race as the Norse, with the same general traditions and close affinity in language, and using the same style of Runic writing in which the Edda epic was written, the British relationships with the Edda are predominant. And the attempts of Eddic scholars at capturing the language of the numerous Runic inscriptions of North England and Scotland for Iceland have, according to the chief authority on these inscriptions, Professor G. Stephens, “everywhere necessarily failed.”³

One of the most striking evidences for Britain as the home of the Edda, apart from the critical British words and idioms in the text, and the practical identity of the writing of the Edda MSS. with the mediaeval British or Early English of about the same date, and the nests of Eddic names and associated legends found widespread over Britain with the currency of the names of Thor, Wodan, etc., is the fact that the popular and hitherto believed indigenous British legend of King Arthur and his Holy Grail is now discovered and demonstrated to be based upon the memory and achievements of the chief hero of the Edda epic, Thor or Her-Thor, that had lingered on indigenously in Britain, after the loss of the Edda MSS. Whilst, on the other hand, there is no corresponding Arthurian legend in Scandinavian nor in Teutonic literature.

Similarly under his title of St George, Her-Thor (or Arthur) became not only the patron saint of England, and his slaying of the Dragon is still a part of the royal insignia, but the great Western Sea-way of Britain was named after him, St George's Channel, and his Cross still forms the standard of the British Navy. St George was pre-eminent amongst the saints of England, and "all English soldiers were bound under severe penalties to carry the distinguishing badge of St George's Red Cross." ¹ Likewise, as Andara or Andrew, he became the patron saint of Scotland with his X Cross.

Another significant point indicating Britain as the later home of the Edda is that one of the great traditional achievements of King Thor was a Parliament, a treasured institution of the Early Britons, which struck its roots so deeply into British soil that when it was revived towards the end of the feudal period, the English Parliament came to be proudly called "The Mother of Parliaments."

The former currency of the Eddic tradition in Ireland also seems indicated by the survival in Irish legend of the solar hero, "Diar-mit" or "Diar-mait," a name obviously coined from that of Thor, Dar, or Thior-Miot; and his wife, "Grainne," with her Rowan berries, is apparently a dim memory of Thor's queen of the Rowan-apples, Gunn-Ifo or Guin-Ever or Gefiôn; and "Conn-the-Hundred-Fighter" of the Irish legend is clearly Thor's heroic son Gunnor "Cain," who, as Kon-the-Young, was "able in energy, he equalled eight men," and when more mature he "equalled nine hundred men." Whilst "Balor of the Evil Eye" and "Fal of the Fiery Stone" or wheel-weapon, are clearly a confused memory of the malignant Baldr or Val, with his fiery stone missile; and "Lug" is the Loki title of the same personage. And "Gwydion" in the Welsh legend of "The Harrying of Hell," appears to be a confused spelling of the name of Gunn or

HOME OF EDDA IN BRITAIN

Gawain of the Edda, who took a prominent part in that achievement. This name seems more faithfully preserved in "Gwion-the-Little," who in the Welsh legend held temporary charge of the Magic Cauldron of Hell, identifying him with the young Prince Gunn of the Edda, who possessed himself of that fetish bowl.

The wholesale fanatical destruction of pre-Christian manuscripts and monuments in Britain, stigmatized as "pagan" by the proselytizing early Christian missionaries, is extensively referred to with pride in early ecclesiastical history, the details of which would fill a volume. The destruction of such MSS. by burning was a usual prelude to the Christian baptism of chiefs and their people. Here may be mentioned the Edict of Nantes of A.D. 658, one of several issued to the Christian clergy for the destruction of pre-Christian stone monuments, which were not so readily disposed of as MSS. It decreed that: "As in remote places and woodlands there stand certain stones which the people worship, and at which vows are made, and to which oblations are presented, we decree that they all be cast down and concealed in such a place that their worshippers may not be able to find them." Similar edicts were issued by Alfred, Canute on his conversion, and by other converted kings in Britain. In the eleventh century details are recorded of the total destruction of such monuments and MSS. at Verulam or St Albans,¹ the pre-Roman British capital of the Catti ruling clan of Britons on the Odling or "Watling" Street, the great arterial northern road of the pre-Roman Britons and preserving the name of the Odling title of Thor's royal clan in the Edda. And so late as 1642 the General Assembly of the Established Church of Scotland threw down and broke in pieces, amongst other Eddic monuments, the fine sculptures of Thor as Eindri or "Andrew" at St Andrews (see e.g., Pl. XXVI), and the magnificently sculptured Runic Cross at Ruthwell (or Rood-well) in Dumfriesshire, one of the finest Runic Gothic Crosses in Europe, although it was clearly of the transitional period, and contained figures of Christ and His disciples, as well as Thorist and Eddic scenes and emblems. Even in Iceland "the destruction of Eddic MSS. which went on in Iceland at the end of the seventeenth century, would have left little to be gathered. All the vellums which still survived in Bishop Brynwulf's possession at his death were scattered, mutilated or destroyed within a few years."²

So deeply rooted was the Eddic cult of Thor in Britain, and so little did it differ with its dogma of brotherly love and its True Cross emblem from that of Christianity, that for several centuries in the early Christian period in Britain the artists, imbued with their ancestral respect for the Edda, represented Christ in the conventional form of Thor or Odin, along with the usual old Eddic symbols and the exploits of Thor. Such are the many stone Crosses throughout Great Britain that have escaped destruction or have been unearthed from where they were hidden, and now termed "Early Christian"; whilst only a few of the genuine pre-Christian crosses still survive or have been excavated. And amongst the many British sites named after those prehistoric crosses, one of Eddic significance is "The Rowan-tree Cross."

The place-names bearing Thor, Odin, Orm or Serpent-Dragon and Arthurian titles, with their associated Eddic legends, whilst occurring widely distributed over Britain, are more especially numerous along the shorelands of St George's Channel in Cumbria, Cambria, Wales and Cornwall, that is on the western sea-way border which, as I have shown in a previous work, was the earliest region settled on by the seafaring Briton colonists from Troy and other parts of Asia Minor, Syrio-Phoenicia and Egypt, in exploiting the mineral wealth of ancient Albion. Those tracts usually contain prehistoric mine-workings, and are especially rich in prehistoric monuments, which sometimes bear Sumerian cup-mark inscriptions, pre-Christian or transition-period Sun-crosses, with symbols identical with the Hitto-Sumerian Trojan and Eddic monuments. So rich is the Cumberland district in Eddic monuments, a district which, through its hilly inaccessibility, escaped to some extent the destruction which befell the plains, that Professor Collingwood, in the belief that the Edda epic was merely mythical, writes: "The neighbourhood of Gosforth was, indeed, geographically the focus of all the influences which fostered the birth of the Eddic poems." The Arthur legend also is widely diffused over Scotland as well as England and Wales, with many "Arthur Seats."

The numerous "Green Man" signboards on old inns in the south of England commemorate the former notoriety of that Eddic personage of the Arthur legend. And Gower peninsula in Glamorganshire, with its Worm's Head and Arthurian legends, and a site of old stone-age man, and bordering St George's Channel, suggests by its name the Sumerian Gaur or Guur and Eddic Geir and Gaur titles of Her-Thor as George or St George.

The characteristic British or English and Scottish words occurring in the Edda have hitherto been supposed to number only a few dozen. But our new literal translation of that epic discloses that the great majority, if not all, of the words in the older Edda lays, are radically British, along with their prosody and idioms, though a considerable number have become obsolete, as in Early and Middle English and Anglo-Saxon, and others slightly altered in modern spelling. So striking, indeed, is the essential similarity of the Eddic language with English that Marsh (although holding the then prevalent belief that the Eddic language was Icelandic and Scandinavian) declared in his History of the English Language: "I should unhesitatingly place Icelandic (i.e., properly the Eddic) at the head of these subsidiary philologies (of the English language), because it furnishes more abundant analogies for the illustration of obscure English etymologies and syntactical forms than any other of the cognate tongues. Almost every sound which is characteristic of English orthoepy is met with in the Scandinavian language, and almost all their peculiarities are found in English; while between our English articulation and that of the German dialects most nearly related to Anglo-Saxon are many irreconcilable discrepancies." 1

Whilst the collection of lays of the Edda epic proper are thus found to be in the ancient British speech, with its home in Britain, it is to be noted that there are also included in the Edda collection in the Codex Regius several other lays which clearly do not belong to the Eddic cycle at all; but are local Icelandic and Norse compositions of relatively very much later date. These deal chiefly with bloody feuds between mediaeval Wodanist, Scandinavian, Gothic, and Hun chieftains, and include attacks by the Goths on the Huns, the defeat of the notorious Hun King Attila; and their scenery is Icelandic and Scandinavian, with snowscapes, sledding, ski-ing, and skating, and two of them refer to the barbarous practice of cannibalism and the use of the skulls of their enemies as wine drinking-cups. Such are the Helgi, Hunding, Volundur, Volsung, För-Skvini, Grippisspa,

THE MINSTRELS WHO SANG THE EDDA AT FESTIVALS

The opening lines of the Central Edda state that that epic was "told" (sung or recited) on "the holy day" or festival; but it does not specify what particular holy day or festival it was. Sunday, the first day of the week, was presumably the holy day of the later Sun-worshipping Goths. But this epic, which even in its abridged form in the Central Edda contains over 500 lines, was probably recited at one of the great Gothic festivals. The only festival actually named in the Edda is the Harvest-tide, on which it is stated that King Her-Thor or Ar-Thur drank wine ceremoniously out of the captured Bowl of Eden, as The Holy Grail. For such a feast of material rejoicing, the theme of the Central Edda would be especially appropriate, as it chronicled Adam-Thor's victory over Eden and his establishment of Civilization with Agriculture, Industrial Life, and the Religion of Heaven and the Cross.

The other great festival of the Early Aryans or Goths was Iðl, Jól or "Yule" (a Sumerian name as I have shown), the festival of the winter solstice, or the returning of the Sun, which old "pagan" festival of Yuletide was latterly adopted by Christianity for the birthday of Christ for mythological analogy.¹

St George's Day was another especially holy day of the Aryans of the pre-Christian period, on which the Eddic heroic poems on St George and his defeat of the Dragon were doubtless sung. In England this festival falls on the 23rd of April, according to the calendar of the Romish Church, which includes so many pagan saints and their days as Christian; and in England blue coats were formerly worn by people of fashion on this day.²

festival is held on the same date in Cappadocia and Syria, under the Greek Church. In general agreement with this date, a Mahometan historian of the fifteenth century of our era, writing of Babylonia, records that the Christians of Chaldea celebrate the festival of St George (Jerius or Gerghis), "towards the end of the month of Nisan." Now "Nisan" is the Semitic Chaldean name for the first month of the Sumerian year (which was an agricultural year, beginning with the advent of the spring), corresponding to the month extending from the 25th of March to the 24th of April, which month was significantly called by the Sumerians "Month of the House of Zag or Sag of the Bowl or Jar." This definitely identifies St George of Babylonian tradition with Thor or Sig or Sag or Zag of the trophy Bowl of Eden or The Holy Grail, and further confirms the identity of Thor, Geir, Gœr or Ar-Thur with St George, the Sumerian Gaur, Guur or Geur.

It is also significant of the pre-Christian "pagan" character of St George and his Red Cross, that the observance of his Day was actively discouraged by the Romish Church, and references to him in the Church Services were left out under the suspicion that he and his festival were "pagan," although it had been endeavoured to identify him with a disreputable Christian martyr of that name. The festival of St George was still kept on that day in England as a national event, with elaborate ceremony, so late as A.D. 1536, as evidenced by the quaint bill of charges for the celebration at Reading for that year. For recital on such festivals on St George's Day and other Thorist holy days, the

His Collect remained: "God who makest us glad through the merits and intercession of blessed George the martyr, mercifully grant that we who ask through him Thy good things may obtain the gift of Thy grace." The miracle credited to this George, the martyr, was significantly that by the sign of the Cross he forced the devil inhabiting the statue of Apollo to declare himself. This betrays Apollo to be Apollyon or Abel, conquered by Adam-George of the Red Cross.

Edda as handed down in writing in its parchment books would be "the book of the words" for the minstrels.

The Minstrel who sang the Central Edda lay or "Sibyl's Vision" was from the internal evidence of that lay a woman; and once she is called "The Prudent or Wise" (Frëda, akin to the Mess.-Gothic Frods "wise"). This was one honorific title applied by Icelanders and Scandinavians to the Venerable Bede, Sæmund, the collector of the Edda, and to some other distinguished historians in the sense of "The Learned." This minstrel bore the title of Vala, Volua, or Sibyl or "Soothsayer." And it was to be expected that when the Edda was stigmatized as pagan and devilish by the Christian Church that its recital should gravitate into the hands of a Sibyl of the pre-Christian cult.

This professional Sibyl was in Iceland a woman of great importance and reputed learning, and was treated with almost royal honours. The description of one of these Sibyls in mediæval Iceland is interesting: "Thor-biorg [literally "The deliverer of Thor"], nicknamed 'the little Vala,' during the winter attended the guilds at the invitation of those who wanted to know their fate. Everything was prepared in the most sumptuous manner for her reception. There was an elevated seat on which lay a cushion stuffed with feathers. A man was sent to meet her. She came, attended by a retinue, in the evening dressed in a blue mantle fastened by thongs and set with stones down to the lap. Round her neck she had a necklace of glass beads. On her head a hood of black lambskin lined with white catskin, in her hand a staff, the head of which was mounted with brass ornaments with stones, round her body she wore a girdle of (?) agaric (knöske), from which hung a bag carrying her conjuring apparatus. On her feet were rough calfskin shoes with long ties and tin buttons, on her hands catskin gloves, white and hairy within. All bade her welcome with a reverent salutation, the master himself conducted her by the hand to her seat." ¹ But latterly she and her songs were suppressed because

THOR'S MULTIPLE TITLES IN SUMERIAN

THOR'S MULTIPLE TITLES IN THE EDDA & IN SUMERIAN & BABYLONIAN DOCUMENTS

Like the subsequent kings and emperors in Babylonia, Ancient Egypt, India, etc., and like the Trojan and Greek kings and heroes of Homer, and like the multiple titles of God as The Lord, The Most High, Almighty, The Omnipotent, Omniscient, King of Heaven, Lord of All, Lord of Hosts, etc., King Thor is called by many different names and titles in the Edda, personal, place, regnal, religious and other besides his original birth-name. Thus he is variously called in the Edda Ad, with dialectic Od, Andvari or Eindri, Adar, Asa, Bil, Dan, Dar or Dur or Thor, Goer or Geir (George), Hod, Miot or Mioth or Modi, Odinn, Oku, Ottar, Rab, Sig and Sig(r)-Dar and Ygg, which correspond to his Sumerian titles of Ad, Adamu, Adda, Andara or Indura, As, Bel, or Bil, Dan, Dar and Dur, Endurra, Gar and Gur, Idim ("Adam"), Had or Hud, Mith, Mitra, Od or Udu, Odoin or Uduin, Odante, Ra, Sagg, Sakh, Ukhu, Zagg and Zakh. On these titles in Sumerian see my Dictionary, WSAD. 5, 13 f., 19, 20, 49, 51, 63 f.; WMC. 130 f., 140 f.

Here are chiefly detailed his titles of Dar and Dur in relation to their late dialectic form "Thor," Goer (George), Odinn, Sig, Sigr-Dar, and Ygg, and "Adam."

Dar or Dár is the commonest name for the foremost deified solar hero in the early Sumerian psalms, with the prefix As or "Lord" — i.e., Thor's Asa title and prefix in the Edda. Dar is written in the polyglottic Sumerian by a word-sign possessing not only the phonetic value of Dar, but also Dara, Daru, Ib, Nin-ib and Uras (Br. 10474-78), which latter two synonyms have been arbitrarily selected by Assyriologists, unpossessed of any key to the proper form of these ancient personal names, and hence effectually disguising altogether the presence of the name of King Dar or Thor in the earliest Sumerian history, and a name which was continued down to the latest period in the solar-hymns. In the Eddic Gothic "Thor" was originally written Dár—Th being a late dialectic letter for D, and the a having lately changed dialectically to o, and formerly written by the same sign, see WAOA. 28, 40, 47 f. And on Dar see WSAD. 51 f., An-Dara or In-Dara or "Lord Dara," and Dur, WSAD. 13 f., 51, 63 f.
THE BRITISH EDDA

This Dar word-sign for his name was also given by the Sumerians the synonyms of Sig-Dar or Hud (or Hod-Dar, Had-Dar or Gar-Dar), by prefixing the sign of the mace or sceptre, the especial emblem of King Thor (Br. 10474)—on this mace sign (or "hammer") see Br. 5560-65. This discloses the Sumerian originals of Thor's Eddic titles of Sig, Sig(r)-Dar, Hod, Ód, Ád and Ottar—the latter three by the not infrequent dropping out of the initial H, as in "Atti" for Hatti or "Hitt-ite," etc., WAOA. 32 f.; and on the Sumerian O for the vowel sign hitherto read U, see WAOA. 38 f., 48 f. and pl. 2.

"Adam," the Hebrew title of King Thor or Ad or Adda, is found to be derived from his later Sumerian or Babylonian name as Ada-mu or "The man Ad or Ada," after King Ad or Thor had become deified, in order to distinguish him from his divine reflex, see Scene XVI.

"George," as Adam-Thor's title, as the historical human original of "St George of the Red Cross of Cappadocia," is represented in the Eddas as Goer or Geir. It is derived from his Sumerian title of Gar or Gar-Dar (Br. 10474 and 5567), i.e., "Dar of the Mace, Cross or Spear" (from which the Old English Gar, "a spear" is derived, see WSAD.). This title is also defined in the bilingual Sumerian glossaries as "The Lord (or Aš = Asa) of the Bar" (Aš-Bar, cf. MD. 22) in which the Bar is represented by the St George's Cross +, which the Eddas represent Thor as constantly carrying. Moreover this Gar word is given the equivalency of Garsu, which is pictured by a sceptre surmounted by a St George's Cross, and called "The Sceptre of the King," and from this Garzu I have shown is derived our English word "Cross," see WPOB. 290 f., 294 f., and on the allied Geur or Kur as "George," see WPOB 319 f.; and see on these names WSAD. The equivalency of George with Jove in modern swear-words is now seen to be presumably owing to the identity of those two personages.

His "Ódinn" title is seen to be derived from his Sumerian title of Odoin or Uduin (see WMC. 130 f., 140 f., 532 f.) or Odanie or Ó-dan-i-e, as a synonym of "Lord Dar" (Br. 10479), with the meaning of "Lord of Light" (and cp. Sayce, "Hibbert Lects.," 1887, 151)—on the O in Sumerian, see WAOA. 38 f.) The Dan "Lord" or Danie in this title also discloses the Sumerian Origin of his Eddic title Dan, a title which is also applied to him in Sumerian as "The Lord Bel' or "Strong Lord" (see WSAD. 49). As, however, in the Eddas, this title Ódinn with his Dur-inn title, is spelt with the double n, in series with Thor's father's name of "Inn-Stane" or "Of the Stone Inn," and as Thor's residences are habitually called in the Edda "Inn" as hospitable guest-houses—a name derived from the Sumerian In, "a brick or stone building" (see WSAD. pl. iii and In), I have translated it in the text as "Od-o'-the-Inn."

His Sig and Sig(r)-Dar titles with their Sumerian derivations are above detailed. On his Ygg title and its Sumerian derivation, see Note 78. And on his other titles see Notes to the names as they occur in the texts.

VI

TUBAL CAIN IDENTICAL WITH CAIN "THE SLAYER OF BAL OR ABEL," & AS THE INVENTOR OF THE PLOUGH

The second Aryan-Gothic or Sumerian king, Gan, Gin or Gun, the crown-prince Gunn or Kon of the Edda, the Qin or Qain of the Hebrews, and "Cain" of our English version; the slayer of Bal, Ibila, Badr, Epli or Abel; and the leader of the husbandmen of his father, King Thor or "Adam," has been demonstrated in my previous works to be the first great developer of Agriculture and the inventor of the Plough in all the ancient traditions, Sumerian, Babylonian, Hittite, Phœnician, Egyptian, Indian and Ancient Briton.¹

He is now clearly identified with "Tubal Cain" of the Genesis legend, which calls him "the instructor of every artificer in brass (properly bronze) and iron."² This verse occurs in a stanza interpolated between the verses on the expanded succession of Lamech from Enoch and Cain, and the verse stating that Adam begat another son, Seth, "instead of Abel, whom Cain slew." That text, which is involved and corrupt, makes Tubal Cain to be the son of Lamech, who is made to declare that he had "killed a man" and expressly associates himself with Cain, with whom we now find he was identical.

The legendary so-called ten antediluvian patriarchs of Genesis, from Adam to Noah, are disclosed by the authentic historical Sumerian and Indian records to be merely a fictitious expansion of the first historical kings of the Aryans or Sumerians, Adam to Enoch, by extending the list with their titles,\(^1\) so that Noah was identical with Enoch, as was, indeed, long suspected by Biblical critics; and "Lamech" is identical with Cain. The name "Lamech" in the Hebrew is obviously coined from the Chaldean-Semitic Lamasu name for the Sumerian Lamma, title for the second king in his later deified form as the colossal man-headed wild bull—Cain; having the title of Ama or "wild bull" not only in Sumerian, but also in the Indian records and in the Edda. And the making of Tubal Cain into a son of Lamech is now seen to be merely a gratuitous conjecture of a late Semitic scribe from a corrupt text containing those names or titles.

² Gen. iv. 22.
THE BRITISH EDDA

Further confirmation of the identity of Cain with Tubal Cain, the artificer in bronze and iron, is supplied by the Book of Enoch, which originally written either in Hebrew or in its sister Aramaic script, is now arbitrarily classed as "apocryphal." It states (chap. viii. r): "And Azaz-êl taught men to make swords, and knives, and shields and breastplates, and made known to them the metals, and the art of working them, and bracelets and ornaments." Here significantly Azaz-êl, which is not a Hebrew word, except the suffix êl, which means "Lord," is disclosed as the Sumerian title for the second Sumerian king (Gin or "Cain"), namely Azag, his Ayus title in the Indian king-lists, and his Ægis title in the Edda. Thus Azaz-êl, or "Lord Azaz," the inventor of metal working of the Hebrew legend, is identified with Cain.

The culminating proof of the identity of Tubal Cain with Cain is found in the name Tubal or Tu-Bal itself. Bal, we have seen was the ordinary Sumerian name for Abel, who is also called Ibêla in Sumerian, and in the Eddas variously Bal, Val, Bald and Baldr—the final \(r\) being merely a nominative affix. Now the prefix Tu seems clearly to be the Sumerian Tu, "to destroy, make die,"\(^2\) and is obviously the Sumerian source of the French Tu-er, "to kill, slay." Tu-Bal thus means in Sumerian "The Slayer of Bal (or Abel)," and with the affix "Cain" makes the identity with Cain beyond dispute.

Here may be cited the fine virile ringing anvil song on Tubal Cain by the gifted Scottish poet, Charles Mackay (1814-89), which significantly embodies, along with the tradition of Tubal Cain's metal working, also the old tradition of his being the inventor of the metal Ploughshare, which we have seen was ascribed to Cain by the Sumerians, Hittites, Egyptians and Early Britons. In this song we can almost hear the ringing of Cain's hammer at his forge, as expressed in the Eddic Scene II.

TUBAL CAIN

(By Dr Charles Mackay)

"Old Tubal Cain was a man of might,
In the days when earth was young;
By the fierce red light of his furnace bright,
The strokes of his hammer rung;
And he lifted high his brawny hand
On the iron glowing clear,
Till the sparks rushed out in scarlet showers,
As he fashioned the sword and the spear.
And he sang: 'Hurrah for my handiwork!
Hurrah for the spear and the sword!
Hurrah for the hand that shall wield them well,
For he shall be king and lord.'

To Tubal Cain came many a one,
As he wrought by his roaring fire,
And each one prayed for a strong steel blade
As the crown of his desire;
And he made them weapons sharp and strong,
Till they shouted loud for glee,
And gave him gifts of pearl and gold,
And spoils of the forest free.
And they sang: 'Hurrah for Tubal Cain,
Who hath given us strength anew!
Hurrah for the smith, hurrah for the fire,
And hurrah for the metal true!'

But a sudden change came o'er his heart,
Ere the setting of the sun,
And Tubal Cain was filled with pain
For the evil he had done;
He saw that men, with rage and hate,
Made war upon their kind,
That the land was red with the blood they shed,
In their lust for carnage blind.
And he said: 'Alas! that ever I made,
Or that skill of mine should plan,
The spear and the sword for men whose joy
Is to slay their fellow-man!'

And for many a day old Tubal Cain
Sat brooding o'er his woe;
And his hand forbore to smite the ore,
And his furnace smouldered low.
But he rose at last with a cheerful face,
And a bright courageous eye,
And bared his strong right arm for work,
While the quick flames mounted high,
And he sang: 'Hurrah for my handiwork!'
And the red sparks lit the air;
'Not alone for the blade was the bright steel made'—
And he fashioned the first plowshare.

And men, taught wisdom from the past,
In friendship joined their hands,
Hung the sword in the hall, the spear on the wall,
And plowed the willing lands;
And sang: 'Hurrah for Tubal Cain!
Our staunch good friend is he;
And for the plowshare and the plow
To him our praise shall be.
But while oppression lifts its head,
Or a tyrant would be lord,
Though we may thank him for the plow,
We'll not forget the sword!'

Note his Gothic dress, with goat-horned Phrygian hat, hammer of his father Thor, and as Bauge or Thio (Bacchus-Dionysos) holds ear of Corn, and garlanded with Grapes, and behind him is a riveted metal Plough. His votary priest has Swastika Sun-Crosses embroidered on his dress. For numerous representations with corn, fruit and Sun-Crosses on Ancient Briton pre-Roman coins, see WPOB.
NOTES TO THE TEXT

1. This is the opening verse in the Völo-Spā Eddic lay (NE. I. 1 f.), which I have found is the Central Ædda and the framework of the whole series of the detached Eddic lays, which are merely its branches. Völo-Spā means literally “The Völo’s Spying.” Völo, Válva or Vala is the title of a kind of prophesying Sibyl or Seeress in the Ædda and in Icelandic Sagas. Its etymology is uncertain. It may be related to the Icelandic Völ or Val and Scottish and North of England Wale, “to choose, select,” with reference to the Sibyl’s choosing of Fate, especially as the second part of the title, namely Spā, “to spy,” has the special sense of second-sight, foreseeing, foretelling, past-seeing and soothsaying, and it is identical in form and meaning with the Scottish Spae in “Spae-wife” for a fortune-telling gipsy; and it is cognate with Latin Spec-ere and Sanskrit Spāc “to see.” Its soothsaying sense, however, suggests that it may be related to Icelandic Bölva, “to curse, swear,” Vāla, Vola, “to wail,” Indo-Persian Bol, “speak,” and English “Bawl” and “Palaver,” all of which I have shown are derived from the Sumerian or Early Aryan Bal, Bul, “to bawl, speak, swear, incant,” and also “interpret” (see WSAD. 27). In this sense of “interpret, speak, incant and chant” it would include the recitation or rather chant of the Sibyl, as the Ædda was sung in verse. Be the etymology, however, as it may, I have translated the phrase into English, in its currently accepted meaning, as “The Sibyl’s Vision”—although the special Eddic word for “Sibyl” is Sif, derived as I have shown from the Sumerian Sib, “enchantress,” with its cognate Isib, “enchanter, conjurer” (WSAD. 22). And I have added to this verse the refrain which so repeatedly recurs throughout this Ædda lay, and which obviously came here in the original before the fragments became displaced (see Foreword.) It has been suggested with probability that the name Veleda mentioned by Tacitus as the name or title of a certain prophetic virgin of the German tribes (probably Saxons) in his Germania, Ch. VIII, may be related to this Eddic Völo or Vala.

2. Her fadir or Her fóthr in different MSS. On Her or “Lord” as Arya or “Aryan,” see Ar, Harri in Sumerian and cognate Aryan languages in WASD. 15.

3. V.; NE. 7. 29. “Ring’d with the wreath” in text hringa ok men is literally, “ringed eke monile or necklace,” wherein men, “necklace,” is Anglo-Saxon Mene. It is seen to be derived from Sumerian Mên, "a diadem, cord, or necklace," cp. Br. 5512, and BW. 240 and WSAD. Its Sanskrit derivative is Mani, "jewel," found also in the famous Tibetan mystic spell: "Om Mani padme Hum," or "Hail to the Jewel in the lotus," see WBT. 139, 148.
THE BRITISH EDDA

4. Iloetn or Iōtun, "Eden." The name is derived from the Sumerian Edîn or Etîn, the home of the oracular priestess, and the deified priestess as "The Mother-goddess," the mother and wife of Ablu (Abel) or "The established Son" (Tammuz), who is called by the Sumerians "The Lady of Edîn" (Sayce, "Hibbert Lects.," 1887, 238). It is accepted by Assyriologists as the source of the Hebrew "Eden." On its Sumerian form and definitions and occurrence in other Aryan languages, see WSAD. 69 and WISD. 35 f. It is also called in the Edda "The Garden of Eden," Iōtna garda, Scene XIV. In Hebrew the word, which is Englished as "Eden," is spelt O-d-n, which fairly equates with the Eddic dialectic spelling—on the O value of this initial letter, the so-called "Ayin," see WAOA. 39. It is also called in the Edda Rôm, which preserves the old Sumerian synonym of Edîn as Rum, see WSAD. 69. Its geographical location is discovered for the first time by the Edda to be unequivocally at the old Hittite capital of Carrchemish on the Upper Euphrates, the chief river of the Garden of Eden in the Old Testament in Genesis, and see next note, 5.

5. "Eve of Ior," in text, Ivid-Ior—d being introduced in Eddic Gothic when the following word begins with a vowel or h. This personal name, Ivo for "Eve," is spelt later on in the Edda as Ifo. Ior, which is also spelt in the Edda as Ur and Urd, is disclosed as identical with the Old "Ur of the Chaldees," but it is the original Ur at Carrchemish on the Upper Euphrates, and not its later namesake in Lower Mesopotamia, which was also latterly a shrine of the Chaldean Mother-goddess, the deified Matriarch and her Moon-god. In Sumerian "The Garden of Eden" or Edîn, and the seat of the oracular priestess and "Mother-goddess" is called Ur-du ("Eridu") meaning literally "City of the Deep" (Br. 897, and cp. Br. 890 and M. 9176 and B. 530), i.e., defining its site at the beginning of the deep navigable channel of the Euphrates on which Eden or Carrchemish stands, with waterway down to the sea of the Persian Gulf. A second Urdu or "Eridu" was later established at the mouth of the Euphrates on the Persian Gulf.

6. Miôt-o'-the-Wood, in text Miôt-vid or Miøth-vid, wherein Vid= "Wood" (i.e., Wood-Cross Sceptre, as we shall see later), defining King Thor as the bearer of the Wood-Cross Sceptre. This is a frequently recurring title of King Thor or Dar, Od or Ad or "Adam" in the Edda, either as simply Miôt or Meite or Meide or with the "Wood" epithet. It is used by Cædmon, King Alfred and other Anglo-Saxons as Metod, as the title of God as "The Creator." It is now disclosed as derived from the Sumerian Mūati, "Lord of the Wood-style (or pen) of Deep Wisdom" (cp. Br. 5579 and WSAD.). It is cognate with Thor or Dar's Sumerian title of Mid or Mit, and Mitra, "The Lord of the Wood-style, the great one of the Land" (Br. 5634 f.; 9864-7; PSL. 240 and WSAD. and WPOB. 46, 57). And it appears to be also akin to the Sumerian Mit or Mid, "Lord," as title of King Thor or Dar, with synonyms of Idim and Edim in series with the Semitic Adam, as I interchanges with A in Sumerian, see WSAD. 1; and on the multiple titles of Thor, Appendix V.

7. This and next verse are from V.; NE. i, 2-3.

8. Ymi, with variants elsewhere in Edda as Gymi and Hymi, was conjectured by the Wodanist Icelander Snorri and other later bards as a male Iōtun (i.e., Edenite). But she is unequivocally called elsewhere "she" at critical points in the older Eddic texts, which describe her there as the pre-Thor or pre-Adamite Matriarch of the Serpent-Wolf cult of Iōtun (or Eden) or Hell. Her female sex is confirmed by the Sanskrit, which calls her Yami, "the Queen of Hell" and the consort of her brother Yama, the first king of the same, who is her paramour Wodan of the Edda. This is fully confirmed by the Sumerian, which calls her Geme, "a maid or concubine" and the variant Zimu (Note 20), with the synonym of Gul and Gal (Br. 10907 f.) both of which aliases she freely bears in the Edda, and thus establishing her identity with Gula, the primitive Mother-"goddess" of the Earth of the Chaldees. The Babylonian tradition also makes the Serpent of the Deep, of which she was the priestess, a female. The change to the male sex only appears in the later versions of the myth-mongering priests of the Egyptians, Indians and Wodanist Goths. This Ymi, the ignorant Matriarch, was the first of the series, and is to be distinguished from the later successor of that name, who was contemporary with Thor-Adam, and somewhat more cultured than her primitive ancestress.

9. Ginnung Gulf, in text Gap Ginnunga, or "The Gape or Gulf of Ginnunga." On the identity of Ginnung with the old Sumerian name of Gi-in-gi or Kan-in-gi for Mesopotamia on the Persian Gulf, see WSAD. xliii. and text, and cp. Br. 9662, 9617-20, and WMC. 75 f., and my article in Asiatic Quarterly, April 1926. This location of Iōtun-land on the Gulf of Ginnunga presumes the tradition that the Persian Gulf formerly extended up to Carchemish.

10. This verse is from V.; NE. 2, 5 f.

11. Nār, River. Text here Nā-strōndo ā or "Nā, River strand," wherein Nā is short for Nār, the full form which elsewhere regularly occurs. Nār in Chaldee-Akkad means "River" or "The River," and is especially "The Euphrates" (MD. 721).
THE BRITISH EDDA

The Upper Euphrates district at Carchemish (see map) was regularly called Nari-ma or "Nar-land" by the Hittites, Assyrians and Egyptians. And even nowadays the main channels of the Euphrates are still called Nahr, see my article on Carchemish in Journ. Roy. As. Soc., 1922, 267 f. Significantly the Ancient Egyptians, whose ruling race I have shown to be Aryan-Sumerian colonists, also used the same name for the Nile as "The River" in the form of Naiār (cp. Budge's Egyptian Dictionary, 343); and Nara also is "The Waters" in Sanskrit, and is a title of great rivers, as, Nar-budda or Ner-budda or "The Deep Waters."

12. Orm="Great Serpent or Worm"; and it is found in British place-names associated with King Arthur, e.g., Orme's Head, etc. On its derivation from the Sumerian Erim, "Enemy, Serpent, Worm," see WSAD. 73.

13. This verse is from V.; NE. 9. 38. On the worship of the Serpent, see Note 18a.

15. "I see." In text, "She sees," descriptive of the repetition of the words of the earlier reciter, and this often serves for the earlier "I see."

16. V.; NE. 9. 39; but it follows the preceding verse in BE. Further references to the varying location of the verses in "The Sibyl's Vision" dislocated in the different MSS. are now omitted in most cases, for want of space.

16a. This title Heide for the pre-Thorite Matriarch weird seems akin to Greek Hāides, "Hell," Latin Hades, personified by the later Greeks a male god (Aides); for her abode is repeatedly called Hell in the Edda.

17. Gandr occurs here for the usual recurring Gandr. Eddic commentators interpret this word Gandr as "sorcerers," also "serpent" and "wolf and witch's broom" (VD. 188). It is akin to the Scottish cantrap for "witchery." In the Sanskrit epic versions of Adam and Eve, the Gandharva are the evil magical sprites who molest Adam (Pūrū of the Sun-cult) and are identified by Sanskritists with the Kentaurs or Centaurs of the Greco-Roman who were adepts in magic. This name Gandr is disclosed as the Chaldee source of the "Goosey Gander" of Old Mother Goose with the witch's broom in the nursery tales.

18. Brūdar, literally "a bride," but with one exception it is exclusively used in the Edda as an opprobrious term for the unwedded houris of Eden—marriage being unknown amongst the pre-Adamite Chaldees.

18a. The aboriginal Mother-goddess-cult in Egypt and Greece also worshipped the Serpent; and Serpents were kept in the Greek temples and supposed to feed on the offerings of consecrated cakes and honey, though they really fed on the rats and mice attracted by those food offerings.

19. Meyiar = "maids," or "virgins," singular Mær, which is a frequent title of the Matriarch, and also used in later Christian times in Iceland and Norway for the Virgin Mary (VD. 443). Mær, maid or virgin, is also written Meyia, and this is obviously the source of the name May and cognate with Greek Maia.

20. This sacred tree of Eden is called Tholli in text. Tholl is defined in the Eddic glossaries as "a tree in general," in Iceland, "a fir-tree." But here it appears to have been evidently intended for the Sumerian Tilla, a variant name for Ur or Uri, "the Date-palm," from which Eden derived its Ur title (Br. 7308). The Date-palm, though now common in Middle and Lower Mesopotamia, is not now indigenous so far up the Euphrates as Carchemish, though widely cultivated on the Syrio-Phoenician and Mediterranean coast to the west. This tree is figured as the sacred tree of Ur or Urdu in many archaic Sumerian seals and in Persian seals (as we shall see), and it occurs on some of the sculptures unearthed at Carchemish. It was perhaps a cultivated tree there, and thus especially precious. In the Sumerian hymns the sacred "Tree of Life" of the Garden of Eden is thus described, and significantly the Eden Matriarch Ymi (or Gymi) (see Note 8), appears to be called therein Zimu, and she and it are said to have flourished before the epoch of Adam-Thor or In-Duru.

In Urdu a stalk grew overshadowing: in a holy place did it become green,
Its root was of white crystal which stretched towards the deep:
Before In-Duru [Adam] was its course in Urdu teeming with fertility.
Its seat was the (central) place of the earth,
Its foliage was the couch of Zimu, mother,
Into the heart of its holy house which spreads its shade like a forest hall no man entered.
(There is the home) of the mighty mother...
In the midst of it was Tamus [or Ablu, Abel]
(There is the shrine) of the two [the Mother-Son].

This extract is from Professor Sayce's translation in "Hibbert Lects.," 1887, p. 238. The explanatory words within square brackets are added by me, and Urdu, In-Duru and Zimu are substituted as more exact readings of the Sumerian for the older transliterations "Eridu, Ea and Zi-ku-um" therein. On the reading "Zi-mu-um" or "Zimu mother," see Br. 10219 and cp. Br. 10505 and B. 481. This Sumerian Zimu reading for the Eddic Gymi (see Note 8), is confirmed by the Sumero-Aryan definition as "Geme, the woman Seer-mother of the temple of Zakh, Zax, or Sax." Br. 10223. On "The Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil," see Note 78.
THE BRITISH EDDA

22. Lög lögdo. Log = "Law or Laws" in Eddic Gothic and is cognate with Greek Logos and Latin Lex, legis, and is presumably the Logos (or "Word of God") referred to in St John's tradition: "In the beginning was the Logos." This Log of the weirds was an oracular Voice, as the logdō following it appears to read "Lugged," i.e., cognate with the Scots lug, "an ear," and meaning, "they lugged or heard the Logos."

22a. Öl here presumably for Ėl, appears to be a dialectic variant of the Matriarch's title, otherwise spelt El, Ell, Ėl, Ėle and El-di later on; and the equivalent of her Semitic, Chaldee or Akkadian title Elū, "priest," cognate with Ėllu, "hell," and Il, Ilu, "god," latterly with the feminine affix t as Ilū or Allatu, "queen of Hades," cp. MD. 38, 50 f. The reading of this rather corrupt passage appears to be as given. CPB. (I. 232) render the third and fourth line "Loki bred the Wolf by Angrboda"; but both Loki and Angr-bodo were admittedly males. On the later interchange of Gothic O and A, see VD. 2, and WAOA. 40 and plates I and II. And on Loki as Baldr, see Note 28.

23. On Bodo as the earlier form of Wodan, see Foreword xxiv. In Sumerian his name is written with the sign of the Serpent and a Foot, with phonetic value of Bu-du, Bodo or Bu-dun (Br. 7560); and he is defined there as "The right-hand man of the Mother-lady or goddess," and as "Lord Si-ir-tur, who was the father of the Chaldean Aplu or Tammuz, who we shall find is Baldr. Cp. Tammuz and Ishtar, Langdon, 21. And in the Edda we shall find he is repeatedly called Sutr and Surtar. Thus the Edda preserves the early Sumerian forms of his name, and shows that "Wodan" was coined subsequent to the Edda MSS. of A.D. c. 1100, in order to filch for him the achievements of Thor or Odin. The Indian evidence also fully confirms this, as cited in Foreword. His Vedic name is Budhnya as "Serpent of the Deep" and opponent of Indra. Whilst as consort of Ida or Ila he is called by the Brahmans Budha, which is still the ordinary Indian name for Wednesday or Wodans-day. Moreover, "the progenitor of the future race," according to Brahmanism (WVP. 3, 29) is to be called Bhautya, with sons Budhnya and "The good Bala" (Su-Bala), which clearly repeat the names of Wodan and Bal or Baldr as glorified by reactionaries.

23a. This verse is from the Hound's Lay section of the Volô-Spâ, HL.; NE. 290, 40.

24. Glads-heimr or "Home of the Glads." This Glad, which is later often spelt Gald and Geld, is used as a title of the Edenites, and is seen to be obviously a dialectic spelling of Chaldee, the Kaldi or Kaldû of the Assyrians, see WPOB. 99. This first line reads "Glads-heim is the fifth inn" in order to adapt it to a later numerical arrangement of the "inns," on the notion that Wodan was an Asa.

25. Ōdin of the text here and later, when it clearly refers to Wodan, is translated "Wodan," which is the usual Teutonic spelling of his name. This distinction is necessary in order to sharply differentiate him from Odinn or "Od-o'-the-Inn," a common title of King Thor throughout the Edda, especially as all modern Eddic writers and translators have hitherto confused Wodan with Thor under this title, with lamentable and hopelessly contradictory results. See details in Introduction and Appendix V.

26. These two verses are from GM.; NE. 56, 8-10.

27. GM.; NE. 58, 19.

28. Baldr or Loki. This identification of Baldr with the villainous Loki is now explicitly disclosed everywhere throughout the Edda: and he is also seen to be the historical origin of Abel. Loki is Baldr's title as Lucifer. Baldr we shall find frequently written later as Val, and it is also written Val-dyr, i.e., "Val-the-beast"—the labials  V, which is a late letter (see WAOA. 49), and B, being freely interchangeable in the Edda and elsewhere, e.g., in Thor's title of Veor for Bur. The original form of Baldr's name is disclosed as Bal, through the Sumerian. In the Sumerian records Bal or "The Oppressor or Destroyer" (Br. 267 and WSAD. 27) is defined as "The Lord Enemy (of the Sumerians), Lukh or Lakh" (Br. 6170). This unequivocally identifies him with Loki of the Edda, wherein he is frequently called by both titles, Baldr or Val and Loki in the same verse. He was also called by the Sumertans Abal and Aballa (Br. 271), and defined as "The man pourer-out or sacrificing of the Lamb" (cp. MD. 717). This discloses Baldr's identity with Abel of the Hebrew legend, and with the deified shepherd of the Chaldees, Ablu or Ibila of the Sumerian (Br. 4116-18), "the established Son (Tammuz or Ablu)" of the Mother-goddess of the Chaldees. And in the Edda Baldr-Loki, who is slain by Adam's son Gunn-Kon, Kynni or "Cain," is called in the lays Epli (see later). The later Wodanist exaltation of the Eddic Baldr or Val-dyr into "Balder the Beautiful and good god," has perhaps been facilitated by confusing its etymology with the Anglo-Saxon Baldor or Bealdor, "The bold, hero, or prince," from Anglo-Saxon Bald, beald, "bold," from the Gothic Vala, "strength," and the Sumerian Bal, "valour," see WSAD. 27.

29. GM.; NE. 57, 12. In some later MSS. Baldr's hall, it is added, is called "The Seventh," on the later mistaken Wodanist notion that Baldr was an Asa, and including his hall in the numerical list of the halls of the Asas. But in others this is correctly omitted. Liggia fasta=lyggia à fasti= "wild beast fastening on or devouring prey." VD. 145.

30. Lindi brendo="burning linden (lance)." This, we shall find, confirms his identification with the historical original of Lancelot of the Arthur legend, and see Note 149.

31. Fann here may perhaps = Van or Fen, see Van Lake, province of Eden in map, as Loki is called also The Wolf of Fen.

32. HL.; NE. 290, 41.

33. Ib.; 289, 33.

34. Varg, "a she-wolf," is seen later to be a variant of the Frigg title of the Matriarch. And see Frig, "Wolf" in Sumerian, WSAD. 78.

35. These two verses are from V.; NE. 10, 45, 5 f.; and 9, 39.

36. Um, literally "over, above," is derived from Sumerian Um, Umun, "master, overlord," and akin to Sumerian Am, Um, "wide, spacious," and was used as title of emperors, WMC. 199, 213.

36a. Sig, a frequent title of King Thor or Dar in the Edda and derived from his Sumerian title of Sag, see Foreword and Appendix V.

37. This verse and closing previous stanza from V.; NE. 10, 44, 5 f.

38. Thor, also spelt elsewhere Dur, is the usual title of this first king of the Goths in the Edda, and was originally spelt therein Dar. It is derived from his usual Sumerian title of Dar or Dur, see Appendix V. On Asa, see Note 40.

39. GTM.. 1, 177; Hm.; NE. 87, 11; Sn. 44.

40. Asa, Asa or Ass="Lord," the title of King Thor and his royal Goths in the Edda. It is derived from the Sumerian As or Assa, "Lord," and a title of Thor or Dar in Sumerian, see WSAD. 19 f.

40a. Mt. Ida, which still retains that ancient name, is situated at the source of the river of Troy, the Ska-Mandar. The Vale of Troy is thus aptly named "Ida Vale." The mountain is snow-capped 5750 ft. high, and was sacred to Zeus (i.e., Zagg, Sig or Thor). Ida or Ila is a Vedic title of the Mother-Cow-goddess, who is also called "The Mother of the Herd," and was associated with Urv-ashī (who we shall find is the Asyn-of-Ur or Eve of the Edda), RV. 5, 41, 19. And Ida or Ila was the wife of Budha, who we found was Bodo or Wodan.

40b. Troy, the traditional builder of which was Dar-danos (i.e., Thor-Dan), was called by Homer Troia or Troiē. The initial aspirated T letter in Edda is a very late letter coined from T and D, thus postulating the early form of Tru for this name; for the final d in Thrud is merely the Eddic phonetic affix introduced after vowels, when the next word commences with a vowel or h. As it stands, however, Thrud can be read "Troad," coined by late Latin writers for the district of Troy.

41. Valas-Kiālf is usually read Vala-skīālf or "Shelf of Vala," which has no appropriate sense in relation to Thor. It appears to me to read Valas-kiālf, i.e., "Valas-on-Sea (or Gulf)," wherein Kiālf=giālf, "the sea" (literally "gulf"), and in Eddic Gothic Gi becomes Ki after an S (VD. 199). This suggests that this Eddic Valas may = Filios, which is believed to have been the oldest form of the name Ilios for Troy (Schliemann, Ilios, 139), especially as V dialectically interchanges with F (see WAOA. 31) and a with i in Eddic Gothic (e.g., Ad=Id, cp. VD. 26, 313). And "Ilios" or Troy is even now only some two and a half miles up the delta from the sea of the Dardanelles.

42. In text Odinn. On this title for Thor or "Adam," see Foreword and Appendix V.

43. These four verses from Gr.; NE. 56, 4-7.

44. Ādr Burs in text. The r in Adr is merely the final Eddic Gothic affix of the nominative case. I have added within brackets -am, in order to identify him. "Adam" as a title for Thor does not occur in the Edda, because these epics contain only the Early Sumerian forms of names, personal and place; whilst "Adam" is derived from this late Sumerian Chaldee title of "Adamu" or "The man Ada," see Scene XVI. On his Bur title in Sumerian, see WSAD. 42; and on his Ad title, see Appendix V.

44a. Ginn here, the Anglo-Saxon Ginn or Gin, "vast, wide expanse," and surviving in our English "begin," is here translated as "most." It is obviously derived from the Sumerian Gin, "all, totality, be full," also "command, rule," and was the common word for "ruler"; and seems the source of our word "King," so that it might here be rendered "kingly."

45. Spelt here and elsewhere in this refrain God, in CR. MS. Goth is a usual Meso-Gothic form for "Goth" (SMG. 122). The word is sometimes spelt elsewhere in Edda as Gaut. Goti is the ordinary name for Goth in Icelandic and Scandinavian, and is, as well as God, derived from the Sumerian Gut or Guti name for "Goth" (WMC. 375 f.), the modern form "Goth," with the aspirated k, having merely been coined by the Romans, though the people themselves never spelt their name with th.

45a. On Danie and Dan as Thor's title in Sumerian, see App. V.

45b. A. H. Sayce, "Hibbert Lects.," 1887, 479-80. In first line Dar for Adar and "Lord Zax," the latest reading is substituted for Mul-lil, long given up. The last four lines are from S. Langdon's Sumerian Psalms, 199 f., in which "Lord Sakh" is a revised reading for En Lil.

48. Lofar. This name offers another striking instance of the authentic historicity of the Edda in preserving literally these ancient names. Lofar is clearly the Lapara of the early Greco-Byzantines, an important ancient city on the Armenian frontier on the S.E. border of Cappadocia, in the upper Valley of the Saros River of Cilicia in the anti-Taurus range and near the modern village of Keni Vere (see W. Ramsay, Historical Geography of Asia Minor, 291 f.). It is described as in the extreme distance of the Lion-tribe land. Its name “Lofar” or Lapara is probably derived from the Akkad name Labu “Lion.” It is significant that in the adjoining valley to the S.E. is the old Hittite city of Marash, with several famous sculptured lions covered with Hittite hieroglyphs.
49. Iöroalla or Jörowalla is clearly the dialectic spelling of the old name for Carchemish, known to the ancient Greeks as Hieropolis, and to the Greco-Romans as Oropus or Europus, and now the modern Jerablus. See my articles in Jour. Royal Asiatic Soc., 1922, 267 f. and 580 f. Aur Vang is obviously the great Lake Van in modern Armenia, wherein Aur is either dialectic for Eddic Ar, “water,” or in its ordinary Eddic meaning of “Mud” i.e., “The Muddy Van Lake.” The Van people we shall see were Edenites. The name of this lake is also spelt with the nasal n or ng in the old Indian Pali Iataka tales of Buddha.

58. Ædłe, Ædl and later Æthl (plus ing or "clan"), is the royal clan of King Thor or Adam frequently cited in the Edda. Significantly it is derived from the Sumerian Etil, "Lord," see WSAD. 75. It is seen to be the same ancient Briton royal name as Watl-ing," which gave its name to the pre-Roman arterial royal roads throughout Britain and so called "Watl-ing Streets," see WPOB. 182 f., 191 f., 198, 205 f., 399 f., 409.

75. For-seti or "Foresight," as the title of Thor or Bur-Mioth, confirms his identity with Pro-Metheus of the Greeks, who interpreted that name as meaning “Fore-thought.”
76. This “Red Horn” is referred to later as the site of Thor’s upright planted Red Cross standard. Niord appears to be a title of Thor as “The North-man,” i.e., the equivalent of Norse or Norman or “Nordic,” and see later that Thor came from the Danube Valley to the North of Troy. The late Wodanist view of “Niord” being a hostage from the Goths to the Vans is not in keeping with earlier and more authentic verse, which obviously identifies him with Thor.
77. The foregoing six verses are from GM.; NE. 58, 17 f.
78. Ygg’s Drasill-Tree of Knowledge. “Ygg” is a frequent title of Thor, varying with Sig (see Note 36) and Uk, Uku and Oku, of which latter series it is evidently a variant, and these are obviously derived from his Sumerian regnal title of Uku or Ukusi of Ukhu City (see my Makers of Civilization, 78 f.). Ygg is obviously derived from his Sumerian title of Zagg. His sacred tree is here and elsewhere called an “Ash,” and sometimes called a Run or "Rowan," which identifies it with the Mountain Ash or Rowan Apple-tree, or Quicken Ash or "Tree of Life," which belongs to the Apple family, Pyrus. On how the Rowan became the sacred tree of the Sun-cult with its Red Cross, see WPOB. 311 f. The name Dra-sill seems to be from the Sumerian Dar or Tar="Tree" (and source of the latter word and of Sanskrit Daru,"Tree") and Silb="great lord or king, counsellor, judge, and a title of In-Dur is King Thor (Br. 2625 f.). The name would thus mean "The King's Tree" or "The great Judge's Tree."

79. Urd, as a title for Eden, significantly preserves the Sumerian Urdu (also read Eridu by Assyriologists) for the home of the Chaldee Matriarch and her son Ablu or Tammuz, the site of which has hitherto been unknown, but now disclosed as Carchemish or Eden. It is also called in the Edda Ærð, see WSAD. 73. Urdar brunni, "The burn or well-spring of Urd," was the divining well of the weirds in Eden, and see Note 5.

80. "The baptized men of men," in text mennzkir menn (GM.; NE. 6131), appears to read as translated. See next Note on Skiva, "baptize." (z frequently exchanges with s).

81. Bilskiri. On Bil as a recurrent title of Thor or Dar, with variant Bel in "Bel-fire," etc., and its use in Sumerian, see WSAD. 38 f.; WPOB. 2, 13, 32 f., 267 f.; WISD. 78 f. Skiva in Icelandic and Norse="Baptism" (literally "the Scouring"), and later in Christ's period John-the-Baptist is called Skiri-Jôn in Iceland and Scandinavia (see VD. 559). In Britain also the word appears to have had probably a like currency and meaning. In Scots dialect Skir="pure" and Skirge, "a dash of water" (Jamieson's Scottish Dict., 485). And "Skiris Thurisdaye" was the name applied to the cleansing or washing festival of Maundy Thursday in the Acts of James VI (Jamieson, op. cit., 485). This last transference of a pagan festival-name to a different date would be paralleled by the Christian adoption and transference of the pagan name "Easter." Significantly, John-the-Baptist or "Skiri-Jôn" is represented carrying a Cross-headed standard, which was also regularly carried by Thor or Bil, as the symbol of the invincible and scouring Sun (WPOB. 292 f.); and see later on. The word Skiva appears to be derived from the Sumerian Sakkarra, "to flood out dust" (Br. 5081, 6361), which was also applied by the Sumers to the rite of Baptism, see WMC, 220, 504; WPOB. 273 f.

90. Blota="worship by oblation." Eve's asseveration of "I worship," applied to her bridegroom, is significant as persisting in the later Christian period in the marriage contract ritual.
91. Skati here appears to be a phonetic variant spelling of the Sumerian Xatti, i.e., "Hittite," and equating with its modern variant of "Scyth" and "Scot," see WPOB. 8, 77, 209, 322, and see Note 210.

108a. The following Eddic references to Thiazi (Tascio), son of Thor, are somewhat corrupted by the copyist having adopted Snorri’s notion that Thiazi was an Iotun or Edenite. In H.L. lay, after the verse stating that Frey (Eve) wedded Gerdi (Thor-George), and that Frey was Gymi’s or Ymi’s and Wodan’s daughter, a verse says:

“Though Thiazi was their (Ymi and Wodan’s) friend (relative) He was scathe-yearned (by) the Iötun, His daughter was Skadi.” (NE. 289, 30.)

And in GM. NE. 57 is:

“Thrym-Hame, the glorious, is the saith Inn Where Thiazi bode, That Inn feared (by the) Iötun, There now Skadi bides, The baptized Gothic bride, On her father’s former green tuft.”

129. Fen is dialectic for Van, see WPOB. 93 f.
130. Osk-Opni. This name for Thor's capital of Vidara or Pteria in Cappadocia is of immense historical importance, as it clearly preserves in Osk its ancient Sumerian name of Ux or Akshak as written in the early tablets of about 2200 B.C., and Ux has the variant spelling of Ukh, which discloses Thor's title of "Oku or Uku Thor." The second part of the name, Opni, confirms this identification, as Ux or Akshak was called by the Akkads Upe and later "Opis." The title therefore, "Osk-Opni" defines Pteria by its two bilingual names, just as we have such names in Britain, e.g., "Castle-cary," on the Roman Wall, wherein the first is the Roman name and the second "cary" was the Briton name Cær, "a castle."
131. These two verses are from NE. 178, 14-15.
133. Edda fragment, NE. 313-14.
NOTES TO THE TEXT

134. Hb.L.; NE. 81, 37. Thiā-alf = "Young Thia," a repeated title of Cain. It seems to be a contraction for Thiazi, earlier Diazi, which is clearly a variant spelling of the name of the Sun-Lord and Corn-Lord Tascio or Dias on Ancient Briton pre-Roman coins and on prehistoric Briton monuments, and occurring as Dias and Tas on Sumerian seals, etc., and as Dias, etc., on Phœnecian coins. See for representations, WPOB. xvi. 261, 335 f., 338-9, 341, 346 f., 353. Later uninformed Wodanist bards, following Snorri, have made Thiazi an Ætun or Edenite, and an enemy of Thor, with stultifying results.

136. Typho is called Seth by Plutarch, De Iside et Osiride, 62.

137. Hūs Drapa. For text, see CPB. 2, 24.

138. Run-ninna kvenna. This appears to read certainly "Runes of Ninna, the Queen." This is of immense historical importance as Ninā, also spelt Ninni with the title of "Queen," is a frequent Sumerian title of the Mother-goddess of the Chaldees and the mother of Ablu or Tammuz; and Ninni with variant Nanna or Nanā and Gimu or Geme (i.e., the Gymi of Edda) is her common title as Ishtar (cp. Br. 3050 and 10906-7; and PSL. 261); and Nana is the title of Baldr's wife in the Edda.

139. Haust-long (presumably for Hauk-long, as Haust = "Harvest," has no application to this Edda. For text, see CPB. 2, 10 f., 16 f.

140. Īsarn in text, i.e., literally "Iron" (which is also spelt Iarn), but which has no meaning here, and is evidently a late copyist's spelling to equate it with the late false spelling in later MSS. of Isarn for the Iarn of "Iārn-Wood" (see before), which we have seen was the Cedar Wood of Van, see Note 128.

141. Māna in text, which word ordinarily means "Moon." But it is probably the traditional equivalent of the Sumerian title of Mahanna (Gal-Mahanna or "King Mahanna") for Ablu or Tammuz, the son of the Matriarch. Cp. Langdon, Tammuz and Ishtar, 117. He is called in the Edda later Gallmann, see Note 189.

142. Svol here as a title of Ei is possibly related to Hebrew Sheol, "Hell."

143. Jātaka Tales, ed. Fausboll, 1, 209, No. 82, and 4, 1 f., No. 439. The Pali word Satta is ordinarily translated "a being."

146. Fafnis Māl.; NE. 176 f.

147. See WSAD. Andara, 13 f.; and Dar, Dara, 51; and for illustrations from Sumerian seals, etc., WPOB. 245 f., 315 f.
THE BRITISH EDDA

The later bards in their prose notes falsely make this Andvara to be a "dwarf," presumably because Snorri introduced that name in the list of dwarfs in the Völo-Spa Edda, from which it is absent in the CR. MS.

148. Hiál-preks, wherein H probably represents an early Kh, as it does in Hatti for Khatti or "Hitt"-ites, see WAOA. 33, and thus might be a corruption of Khilikia or "Cilicia," which I have shown was sometimes shortened in Sil, WPOB. 43 f.

149. Here Loki-Baldr, by his "glowing linden lance" (as in previous verse, see Note 30) is identified with the libertine "Sir Lancelot" of the later Arthur legends.

150. Oinn here though probably a contraction for "Odinn" or "Od-o'-the-Inn," is in series with the Sumer-Akkad name An or Anu for "Lord of Heaven."

152. G.Ma.; NE. 65, 51 f.

153. Ölr as written in text literally means either "Aled," i.e., "worse for ale," or Öli, "an idiot" (VD. 759). I have rendered it "holed" (Icelandic Hol) under the circumstances; but it is probably "aled."

154. Text in H. Winckler, Der Thon-tafel-fund von El Amarna, p. 166; and see L. King, First Steps in Assyrian, 215 f.

155. WSAD. 20.

156. Text in NE. 273, 1 f. and "translation" in CPB. I, 181f.

158. The inscription reads In-ili or In ni-ni, i.e., House or Inn of Ili or Nini—Nini is dialectic for Nana title of mother-goddess, and Ili=El. But the words are usually translated by Assyriologists as "House of the gods."

158a. See later, Scene XXIII.

159a. Zeus (i.e., Zagg, Zax, or Thor) was, according to the Greeks, nourished by the milk of the Goat Amallthain (which name seems coined from that of Adam's mother, Hledi, with Sumerian prefix of Ama, "mother."

160. Hált Dan fyrr="First of the Dan region." Hált=in Ulfla's Gothic and Anglo-Saxon Half, "region or quarter of the world," VD. 242. It literally means "Half" in sense of Half of the World. Thus in Icelandic and Norse Austr álfa="The East or Asia." Hált is also used in the sense of "Kin." Dan country here designated is obviously the Danube Valley.

161. Östtan=Gothic Vestan, "Western," cognate with French Quest. In the same Edda Austr="East."

162. Edl, royal clan name of King Adam-Thor from Sumerian Etîl, "Lord," see Note 58.

163. Yngl-ing. This I have suggested is the clan-name of the Angles and source of "English," WPOB. 186.

164. Iormun, a title of the Matriarch as "The Worm or Serpent," and the Irming or Erming name for "Devil" in Anglo-Saxon, see WSAD. 73-4.

165. Eylimi = Old English leman, "sweetheart, lover," cognate with Icelandic and Norse elín, "a concubine."

166. Gær-völl, NE. 291, 43. Völl = ordinarily an enclosed field or paddock, from Völ, "a pole," derived as I have shown from Sumerian Bal, a "pole," WSAD. 26. It thus designated a palisaded enclosure, and might be rendered "walled."

167. This last verse is the concluding verse of the Edda first cited in this Scene, NE. 275, 14.

168. WPOB. 8, 322 f.

169. WISD. 30 f., 123 f., 127 f.

170. WPOB. 203 f., 331 f.

171. Loka Senna, NE. 93 f.

172. Aegis, see its Sumerian original Azag, WSAD. 22. As the Lord of Plants he is disclosed to be the Sumerian Gothic original of Jack and the Bean-Stalk.

173. Bauge, from the Sumerian title of Bakus, the historical source of Bacchus, see WSAD. 26.

174. Her = Arya or Aryan, see Sumerian original Harri, Ara, Ar, WSAD. 15.

175. Vidar here and later is a title of Cain, presumably because he was born in Vidara, the Sumerian original of the name "Pteria" for Thor-George's capital in Cappadocia, the old Helot capital at the site of the modern Bogaz Köi. In Sumerian, Bidarra means "joyous," and is written by the sign of a harp (Br. 10880 and BW. 495); and we have seen that Cain was a harpist in Scene X, wherein he also is called a "bard," Bragi, from Sumerian, see WSAD. 34.

176. This sentence is disclosed as the evidently misread source of the later Arthur legend of Sir Gawain cutting off the head of the Green Man, who goes off carrying his head in his hand.

176a. Muspell is referred to as a dark forest on the borders between Thor's Highland territory and the Eden plain. It is evidently the Chaldean Muspalu (for Sumerian Pu-lal, cp. Br. 10274, and M. 7801-2), meaning "Full of, or deep with, Trees," which was the name of a district (MD. 608, and cp. Xenophon's Anab. iii. 4, 10, for Mespliá, where the word means "Medlar trees").

THE BRITISH EDDA

177. On this reference to Fal's Fiery Wheel, see Scene XV.
178. V.; NE. 10, 44.
179. Huera lundi = Ewer-grove.
179a. GM., NE. 63, 39.
179b. Skollo, possibly a pun on Skalli, "Bald," for Baldr.
180. Sayce, op. cit., 478, 480.
183. BE. text gives all these five verses in this sequence; but
CR. etc. displaces the last three, see NE. pp. 6 and 8.
185. "Orpheus," I venture to suggest, may possibly be coined on the territorial title of Thor as King of Orpos or Oropus, i.e., an ancient title of Carchemish or Eden, of which we shall find that Thor latterly became king. On this Oropus title for Carchemish, see my articles in Jour. Roy. Asiatic Soc., 1922, 267 f. and 580 f.
187. On the Adamite origin of St George's Cross, and of the long or pedestalled Cross as a pre-Christian Aryan religious and "devil-banishing" symbol from the Sumerian period downwards, and the manner and date of its introduction into Christianity by the Goths, with numerous representations, see WPOB., 6 f., 259, 255, 262, 278 f., 289 f., 294 f., 301 f., 314 f., 344.
188. Thors Drapa. Text in CPB. 2, 19 f.
189. Gallmann. This title for Baldr seems clearly to be the Sumerian Galmahanna title of Ablu or Tammuz in the Chaldean hymns cited by Langdon in Tammuz and Ishtar, 117; and see Note 141.
190. This rather condensed text seems to read thus. Vanir may, however, be a designation of the War-wolves as "Vans," i.e., of "The Wolf of Van or Fen," i.e., Loki.
191. Vik-inga = voyagers," from Vikia, "to move, turn, steer," cp. VD. 716. The term "Viking" thus did not mean
"pirate" as in the later period.
192. Siola here for "king" is of immense historical importance, as it is the old Sumerian Sil for "king," the Sil of the Hittites and Silu of the Akkads and Assyrians, and it was used by the Brito-Phoenicians as the word for "king."
193. Arfi or "Ox," as a title for Cain, is significant, as Cain is further on called "Ox," the equivalent of his Sumerian title of Ama, "wild bull" with the sense of "warrior" and a title of great Sumerian kings (see WSAD. 12); and Cain is called Ama in the Indian Epics, see my WMC. 140 f.; and he is also called Amo in Edda, see Notes 207 and 212.

194. Siba, "shepherd," disclosing the Sumerian origin of that English name.

198. Fun-ristis= "Fire-wrester." This identifies again Thor or Bur-Mioth with Pro-Metheus, who, according to the Greeks and the Indian Epics wrested fire from heaven and brought it to the home-hearths of men.

199. See Note 197.

200. Ell-Ida. Here El gets her double title of Ell and Ida (or Heide). Or it may be the full Semitic form of her title as Ilatu of the Assyrian and Chaldee.

201. Kiaal, as title of the Matriarch is clearly a variant spelling of her previous title of Gul, Gull or Gal, which ordinarily occurs in Sumerian as Gul or Gulā.

202. Lopt, title for Loki appears to be a variant of his Semitic title of Labu or "Lion."

203. Thor Drō Midgardz Örm or Hymis Kvida. Text in NE. 85 f.

204. Huer= "bowl for drinking water, wine," preserved in English as "Ewer." It is derived as I have shown from the Sumerian Eunr, "a drinking-cup or vessel," see WSAD. 76.

204a. Hebrew Ėgel, "a bull-calf or young bullock, the golden calf worshipped by the Israelites," Deut. ix. 16. It was also title of "a leader or prince," e.g., Psalms lxviii. 31.

205. Āst-rād, Āst= "Love," the Anglo-Saxon, Est, Oest, "Love" and designating the goddess Eastore of the Anglo-Saxons, who gave her name to "Easter-day," see WSAD. 76. It thus appears to be cognate with Astarte of the Greeks and Oshtar of the Semites. Rād= "counsel" cognate with Old English Rede; it also means "foretelling" or "foresight," cp. VD. 485.

206. This late text has fadir, i.e., "father's," to adapt it to the late Wodanist view that Hymi or Ymi was a male. But the metre here seems to require modir or "mother," which is the correct term as we have seen.

207. Āmo with variant Ėmmo (NE. 86, 8). This title for Cain is of immense historical significance, as it is this Sumerian title of Ama or "Wild Bull Warrior," see Notes 193 and 212.

THE BRITISH EDDA

208. This title of Cain as the equal of "Nine hundred men," is disclosed as the Eddic source of Cain's Irish title of the solar hero Conn as "The fighter of a hundred."

208a. See WMC. 68 f., 140 f.

209. Here Baldr is called Hymi in these later MSS., and he was the source of the Indian Yama as "God of Hell."

210. Andskoti appears to read literally "And(-ara)-the-Skoti," wherein Skoti=the Sumerian Xatti (or Hatti or "Hittite") which I have shown to be the origin of "Scyth," the Skothos of the Greeks and of "Scot" (WPOB. 8, 322 f.). And see Note 91.

211. In the text "himself."

212. Thiorr=Young Bull, and equivalent of Greek Taurus, "Bull," cp. VD. 740. This strikingly confirms Cain's title of Amo as "Bull" in Notes 193, 207.

213. Here stanzas 16-27 of text are omitted, as they are obviously late interpolations.

214. Here the titles Röa and Kynni are significantly used for Thor-Bur and Cain, the former again identifying Adam-Bur (the Bur or Puru of the Sumerian, see WSAD. 42), with his Indian Vedic and Epic title of Puru-Ravas or "Puru of the Sun" (Ravi)="Sun," the Ra of Egyptian, and both derived from the Sumerian Ra, "Sun" (see WPOB. 242, 246 f. and WSAD.).

216. Bur="Stone Bowl" in Sumerian, WSAD. 42; and cognate with Hver of the Edda, the Ewir, Sumerian for "a drinking-bowl or jug," see WSAD. 76.

217. Sayce, op. cit. 479 f. For "Mul-lil" therein, or reading now given up, I have substituted the later reading of "Lord Sakh," see WPOB. 244, 259 f., 343 f. And on his identity with the Sumerian Adamu, see MD. 587.

222. This old descriptive phrase for the Battle of Eden between the Chaldee Edenites and the Aryans that "Fields sink into the sea" appears to be the germ from which the later Chaldee myth-mongers invented their myth of "The Floods." And see Note 226.

222a. Br. 5634.
NOTES TO THE TEXT

223. Hubur or Xubur as title of Mother Ilu or Illat or El, see MD. 303; disclosed as source of the name of "Old Mother Hubbard" of dog-feeding fame.

228. WPOB. 249, 334 f., 349 f. 229. WSAD. 20.

230. The Hebrew variants, El, Eloha and plural Elohim are all rendered "God" in English version.

231. In the ancient Greek text of the Testament of Abraham (ed. M. R. James, Cambridge, 1892, 39) Abel is called "The Judge of Hell."

239. On "Abel" in Sumerian and identity with Baldr, see Note 28.

240. Sirtur, title of Wodan, see Notes 23, 63.

241. S. Langdon, Tammuz and Ishtar, pp. 10 f. In these extracts from the hymns, for "Tammuz" of the translation, its synonym of "Ablu, the established son" is substituted; and for Anu ("heavenly" and "lord") its Semitic synonym Ilu or Illatu, "lady" is substituted; and for Eanna, its meaning of "temple."

244. Most of the MSS. here have hann="he" for hana="she."

245. Text in CPB. 2, 24.

246. Ur-Sal is apparently "*Sael of Ur," in which Sael presumably is the Sumerian Sal, "woman." But in Anglo-Saxon *Sael="good, happy."

247. Innan in klaut innan sva minnom, may possibly represent the Sumerian Inninni, variant of other Nana, matriarchal "mother-goddess" title. 248. Text in CPB. 2, 27.
THE BRITISH EDDA

249. On the Sumerian Buzur title, see Br. 8634 f., BW. 392; PSL. 67. And on Buz, "a witch," as title of the Semitic matriarch or "earth-goddess," see WSAD. 43.

250. Suivaor here is possibly phonetic spelling for Sumerian Xubur, a dialectic form of Khubur, a Semitic title of the mother-earth "goddess," disclosed as source of "Mother Hubbard"—V and B being freely interchangeable.

257. See for ancient Sumerian and Phœnician figures of these two forms of Cross with full proofs of their Solar Fire origin and ritual, WPOB. 290, 294 f., 316 f.

258. See on Asa Note 40 and WSAD. 20; and on the Emperor Sushena ("Gimil Sin"), WISD. 55 f.

258a. On Rum as Sumerian synonym for Edin or "Eden," see Note 4 and WSAD. 69.

259. Sayce, op. cit., 478, 481-3 and see re Dar, Note 38.

263. Text has "she sees," here descriptive of the utterance of the former singing Sibyl or Balladist.

264. Sayce, op. cit., 450, 483.

265. Langdon, Sumerian Psalms, 22-23, wherein the words in brackets are mine, also Urdu for its variant Eridu, regarding which see Note 79. This Chaldee hymn does not say how Tammuz returned from Hades or Hell; but he is again accompanied by his mother, also called his "sister" and "wife." In the later Semitic hymns his mother is made to go to hell and bring him back as a resurrection from the dead, and he is then invested with the attributes of the Sun-God of the Aryans, disclosing his partial assimilation of Adam's cult. And latterly he was made the Sun-god of the Mother-cult, as Apollo, Abel, or Apollyon, the sanctified Lucifer.

266. Christmas-tide under the name of "Iól, Jól or Yule" was the great "pagan" Gothic festival of the winter solstice or returning of the Sun.

267. Sir Gawayne (Gawain) and the Green Knight, tr. by K. Hare, 1918, 2 f. 268. See Note 36a.

272. WPOB. 160, 169, 171, 216, 413, and see my WMC.
273. See WMC.
274. This verse is variously displaced in different MSS., being 21st in the Codex Regius (NE. 5), 25th (ll. 105 f.) in Bergmann, and variously ll. 57 f. and 64 f. in CPB.
275. Text has "she sees" here as recitative in repeating the earlier Sibyl's speech.
276. This seal with many others of this reactionary Moon-worshipping dynasty of Ur shows that Wodan or Bodo was latterly deified by the Semites as "The Moon-god," and his name approximated to Thor's title of Udun or "Odin." His Eddic title of Bodo is seen in Note 23 and Figs. 5, 7 to be derived from his Sumerian name of Budu or Budun or "The Serpent Footed," and agrees with his Indian title of Budha as "Son of the Moon (Soma)" and his Vedic title of Budhnya or "Serpent of the Deep." His Eddic title of Bauta agrees with Sumerian Batu, meaning "Deep, Hidden, Secret" (Assyrian Kat-ma Br. 9993, wrongly read there "Shu-ma") and a title of the Moon sign Br. 9971. And this is in phonetic series with his Egyptian title of Ptah or "Ptah." He is also called in later Semitized Sumerian "The god Udan of Uru City" (Br. 6453), which name is obviously the source of the confusion of Wodan with Odin or Thor. The Semitic equivalent of this Udan title is Nannaru or "The Luminary," i.e., The Moon. And "Mooney" is repeatedly an Eddic title for him and his son Baldr. Udan is possibly related to Hebrew god-name Adonai.
277. This Löd-Urr title of Thor's son Gan or "Cain" as teacher of handicrafts, identifies him with Tubal Cain. Löd = a Lathe, specially a "Smith's Lathe" (VD. 404); and Urr = the Urus Wild Ox of the Taurus (VD. 669). Now this ox is called Ama in Sumerian lists, meaning also "hero," and it is a common title of Thor's son both in Sumerian and in the Edda. The Eddic bard translated it into its well-known European equivalent of Urr, "The Urus Wild Ox," and type of a hero. He was the traditional inventor of the Plough in Sumerian and Indian records (WPOB. 340 f.). And see Pl. XXIX.

GLOSSARY

Kem, comb, S. Cam, Kamb, OE.; Kamm, Ger.

Lake, Laik, gift or pledge, OE. and S. Lac, Loc. Middle English. (Lauk or Lök), Lakh, gift, A-S. This is a critical Eddic word for the place of the composition of the Eddas, as it is not found in Icelandic or Scandinavian with the sense of "gift," only in Old British. Now, I find that it and its dialectic variants are derived from the Sumer Lāg, a gift, see Br. 5951, 5969-70; PSL. 216 and WSAD. It is obviously related to "Luck," "good fortune" and Lucre, "wealth, coin," which are cognate with Sanskrit Lakṣmī, "luck, good fortune."

Lark (with intrusive Cockney r), game, play, sport. Lak, Lok, OE. Lāc, play, contest, sport, A-S.; Lachen, Ger. From Sumerian Lākh, "to go or run, go and come," pictured by a pair of legs, Br. 4935 f., see WSAD. It is cognate with Sanskrit Lakṣa, "to aim at a target" in play or war.

Leman, lover, sweetheart, OE. Leaf-man, or lover, A-S.

Lief, love, belove, agreeable, pleasant, OE., and S.; Lieb, love, Ger.

Lift, the sky, OE. and S. Lyft, air, A-S. From Sumer, Lib, Lif, lift up, WSAD.

Limmer, a mongrel hound, a jade.

Ling, heath, presumably from Ling, "a species of rush or thin grass." Jamieson, Scot. Dict.

Lout, to bend low, also a hulking fellow, S.; Lut-an, to stoop, A-S.; Hlutan, G.

Mace, a stone mace or club, also sword and The Cross-standard or Sceptre; Mece, sword, falchion, A-S. All from Sumer Mas, a mace, bar, wood-sceptre, cross-symbol, bright, fire, smash, WSAD. under Bar, 33, and WPOB. 278, 412.

Marches, boundary, border, bound-marks; Mearc, boundary, A-S.; Mark, Ger.; cognate with Sanskrit Marga, a path, a track. Now seen to be from Sumer Mar, set, place, establish, twist, turn, rest. Br. 5820 f.; BW. 262, and see WSAD.

Maun, must, S. The Eddic Gothic form Mun, preserved in the Scots, Maun, for this "obligatory" verb suggests that the unknown root had not a final t as conjectured by Skeat and others, based on Chaucer writing moot for the modern "must"; but that it was a simple Mu, and that the affixes n, t or st, are merely formative or case-endings. It thus seems probable that its unknown root is the Sumerian Mu or Ma, "to go forth or out, create, drive away." Br. 4302 f., and see WSAD.
THE BRITISH EDDA

Mere, a mere, marsh, lake, sea; Mere, lake, sea, A-S. From Sumer Mer, watery space, marsh, tearing storm water, i.e., "sea," see WSAD., PSL. 237 and WPOB. 243, 260.

Mickle, much, OE.; Micel, Mycel, A-S.; Muckle, S. From Sumer Makh, Max, much, great, many, maximum, see WSAD. and WPOB. 252.

Moot, Mote, meeting, assembly, or council for discussion in towns, as opposed to Thing, a district or national council or parliament; Mot, Go-Mot, A-S.

Neive (in text, Hnefa), fist, S. The Eddic spelling suggests the word is based on the word "Hand" with the d omitted.

Ness, nose or promontory of land. Naes, A-S.

Nout, neat or bullock, S.; Neāt, A-S.

Orm, serpent, worm, dragon, OE.; Wyrm, A-S. From Sumer Erim, the enemy, the sea as chaos, or evil spirit, WSAD. 73 f.

Pyre, pile of wood on which dead body is burned. From Sumer Bir, Pir, fire, burn, WSAD. 33 f.; WPOB. 291.

Quean, a saucy woman, courtesan, OE. and S. From Sumer Gin, a maid-servant, concubine, WSAD.

Rede, Read, counsel, advice (rational), OE.; Raed, A-S.; Rede, Ger. From Sumer Rid, direct thoughts, overseen, Br. 5956, Meinsner 4279, BW. 270 and WSAD.

Rune, runic letters, mystic spells, mysteries; Rūn, A-S. "Rowan," the symbol of the Gothic Cross, appears to be related to Sumer Gu-Run, "a berry or fruit," the word-sign for which has the form of a Cross, WSAD. and cp. WPOB. 311. On Runic letters, see WAOA. 21 and plates.

Sark, shirt, OE. and S.; Serce, Syrce, A-S.

Shaw, thicket, small wood, OE. Scaga, A-S.

Soke, a district in old British law held by Socage, or tenure of land by service, fixed or determinate in quality; also a miller's right to grind the corn within a certain manor.

Stound, a time, hour or so (short course), OE.; Stund, A-S.; Stunde, "an hour," Ger. It seems to be the origin of the modern slang "Stunt."

Swaft, swarthy, dark, black; Sweart, A-S.

Swither, doubt or hesitate, OE.

Tang, a sharp-toothed goad or prick; Steng, A-S. From Sumer Dan, tooth, cut, tear, WSAD. 49.

"The Makers of Civilization in Race and History"
(Luzac & Co., 1929)

Startling book on our Sumerian ancestors—where the British came from—Dr Waddell is a researcher who shows great learning—great wealth of knowledge and illustration.—Daily Mail.

The Truth about Civilization. Arresting volume explicative of many historical mysteries—steps in research and conclusions read like a romance—the true nature of the Aryans and their relations to the present peoples and civilizations of the world with monumental and documentary evidence in support—so likely, so reasonable, so rational, so connected link by link into an established sequence that it calls loudly and insistently for close attention.—The Literary Guide.

Of absorbing interest, a fascinating and challenging work. Opens up to us a new and surprising historical perspective. The theory of the pre-Roman barbarism of this island has perished utterly.—Leeds Mercury.

Extraordinarily interesting book. One of the romances of research—revealing things that may startle the ordinary man, while they fill him with encouragement.—Birmingham Post.

Remarkable discoveries—lavishly and beautifully illustrated.—Birmingham Daily Mail.

A monumental book of convincing appeal, unusual merit and engrossing interest, the labour of a generation of painstaking research with a constructive mind which is not too common among archaeologists. Its appeal is not only to the historian, but to the student of mythology and comparative religion. Not the least fascinating pages are those in which Dr Waddell very convincingly builds up a case for the historical human originals of the principal gods and heroes of classical antiquity. The Index for fulness is a model of what such aids should be.—Dundee Courier.

One of the most disillusioning of books.—Northern Whig.

The author has tried and succeeded in establishing the fact that there is unity in what has always been regarded as most diverse and divided, i.e., Race and Religion. The book has appeared too at the psychological moment. Fascinating subject—the reader must find time to read the book through from cover to cover.—The Pioneer, India.

Epoch-making discoveries bound to affect profoundly the work of archaeologists.—United India.

Of infinite interest and importance.—Guelph Mercury, Ontario.

A truly remarkable literary work of compelling interest.—Montreal Daily News.

The most valuable recent work in ethnology—a new research method of great service to scientific history.—New York Times.

"The Phoenician Origin of the Britons"
(Williams & Norgate, 1924; 2nd edition, 1925)

A most interesting book. It certainly appears to scratch out the "pre" from the so-called "prehistoric" period in which the origin of our island-ancestors was deemed "lost."—Daily Mail.

Dr Waddell's book exercises a convincing effect—his conclusions and discoveries are remarkable, and they are advanced in a manner essentially that of the scientific historian. Deduction follows deduction until the complete edifice stands revealed with every stone in place.—Literary Guide.

Never before has the Phoenician theory of the Britons been presented so authoritatively and supported by such an imposing array of evidence.—Northern Whig.

Is nothing short of a real romance—a book you have to tear yourself away from. Profusely and well illustrated—a fascinating book.—Birmingham Gazette.

A book of remarkable and unusual interest, written in a very interesting manner. The facts and explanations are very striking and fill over 400 pages, interspersed with drawings of the monuments, coins, stone relics, ancient inscriptions, etc.—Newcastle Chronicle.

Fascinating deductions of stimulating interest. The claim is all the more interesting because it approaches the subject from a new angle.—Western Morning News.

Proofs as convincing as they are laboriously worked out.—Daily Graphic.

Remarkable and fascinating story of engrossing interest.—British Weekly.

Students of "our mysterious ancestry" must now consult this work on British Origins, so learned and well illustrated.—Glasgow Herald.

A stupendous thing. A book of Truth stranger than Fiction—written in a clear and straightforward style that appeals to the average intelligent reader who has an interest in progress and the manner of that progress of his race.—Globe, St John, N.B.

The book is packed with interesting facts from the latest authorities, and the illustrations are happily chosen. Indices are all that could be desired.—Professor A. H. Sayce.

The glory of descent from pure British stock has been greatly enhanced by an archaeological feat of the first rank.—New York Evening Post.
